THE DEPARTURE.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, BY T. HEMPSTEAD.

Trembling through the beaded mirts,
Round the islands in the sun,
With a quiet, murmured music,
Steal the wavelets, one by one.

Night is fleeting, Earth is waking,
Labor, Life, and Day return;
Down the village street the anvil
Sends an echo clear and stern.

Hope stands by me like an angel,
Faith that sees with "eye divine,"
And the maiden smile of Morning
Lifts the sinking heart of mine.

Down the ferny, wildwood valleys,
Lined with freesia deep and green;
Through the lips of whispering cheeses,—
Many a yawning ledge between;

Lie the footprints of the River
Stamped upon the sparkling sand;
And our footprints lie together
For the Southern, Summer Land.

SONG.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Oh! tell me not of brighter days,
Such I may witness never more;
Each tender scene hath fled my gaze,
And ev'ry charm of life is o'er.
Pain would my tongue no more repeat,
The chilling memories of the dead;
But ah! in vain I strive to cheat
This poor heart of its secret dread.

Then chide me not that I remain
To him so faithful as when here;
If thou would'st read this heart in twain,
Then bid me cease to shed a tear.
Oh! let the burning fountain flow
Until it reels in Lethe's lake;
Silance would but increase the woe,
And doom the anguished heart to break. F.

FRED STRICKLAND'S ESCAPE.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, BY HARRY HARTMAN.

CHAPTER I.

"I am sorry, Fred," said a sister to her brother, "to find that you do not like my particular favorite Dorothea."

"Phoebus, what a name!" said Frederick, laughing. "One would think that her sponsors, gifted with a prophetic spirit, had imposed this unusual title upon her, conscious that neither grace, beauty, wit, nor wisdom, would be hers; and, in short, that she would be completely and utterly deficient of every winning trait, and every attraction."

"Peace, you libeller! In the first place, I enter a plea for the name itself, which has been worthily borne by many a lovely, and many an excellent woman; and next, I defend this particular wearer against all comers. She is every thing that is good and amiable—pure, high-minded—"

"Enough—enough, sister mine—spare, oh spare me Dorothy's praises! I will concede all that you claim for her—nay admit that she is perfection itself, since it matters little to me what she is; and I am very sure that my sister would not be so very fond of any person who had not some merit, though unappreciable to the unprejudiced observation of an impartial person. Why is it that woman has notions of woman so different from man?"

Sister Clara did not answer—or, if she did we have never heard what she said. But the fact is unquestionable that women do look at each other with very different eyes from those through which men see the sex; and it is also another fact that a sister's advice is usually worth hearing, in these matters. But nobody's council should be blindly followed—be the adviser man or woman, except under very peculiar and unusual circumstances. Fred was very little likely to fall into this error, however. It was not that he had what is called "a mind of his own," for, far from being obstinate, he was not even steady in his pursuits and purposes, seldom remembering from one week to another the intentions which he imagined he had deliberately and seriously made up, to last forever, and a day. If he kept them a day it was very well for him, leaving the large and somewhat indefinite remainder unremembered.

But Frederick if he had not settled purposes, had impulses, which, while they lasted, were quite as strong; and contradiction sometimes forced or rallied him into remembering, and then giving them the character of resolves. Clara knew this trait in his character, and therefore wisely forebore to press the desience of her friend, perfectly sure that her brother if let alone, would forget that he had ever committed himself by declaring against the unapproached Dorothea. As to Dorothy herself, Frederick was to her a mere acquaintance, very little more interesting than any other of his species, and that little solely on account of his sister, whom she loved and admired. Dorothy was not handsome. She was not pretty. She was not, it must be acknowledged, in any degree likely to arrest the attention of a stranger. She was such a woman as is sometimes denominated a "wall flower," but this was in externals only, for unlike most neglected women, she was perfectly contented in her neglect—more than content, she was happy. As she never desired admiration, it did not at all disappoint her when she did not receive it; and as her circle of near friends who knew, dearly loved her, this was sufficient for her warm heart, and she was satisfied. She rejoiced in their joys, and felt all their triumphs, as if they had been her own—except, indeed, when these triumphs were not properly founded, and then the sincere and right-minded girl did not conceal her want of sympathy. Dorothy did not talk ten items, or affect the monitress. She did not read homilies to her friends, or assume the right to instruct them. She did not even pretend to frown, or to look displeased. But when her mild blue eyes spake no pleasure at what passed, or when she did not seem to listen, or to approve, that was enough. Her silence was a rebuke, and her failure to approve was a sufficient reprimand. And it was the more efficient that it was, as it seemed, involuntary and unobtrusive.

Such was Dorothy. Perhaps, for the truth must be told, some of her female friends liked her none the less that, good and amiable as she was, there seemed no danger that she could become a rival. And, as she was by no means deficient in penetration, it may be that she suspected this state of things. If she did, however, she did not betray her knowledge of the fact, but silently carried it, with other advantages, to the credit of her plain face, and congratulated herself that she was not handsome. She looked forward to her single destiny as a thing fixed so late, and, weighing its advantages, felicitated herself upon the escape which she should make, from the trials and responsibilities of matrimony. Dorothy was too conscientious to avoid any duty or shrink from any task which her lot in life might impose, but that did not prevent her from being pleased at a fair and honest escape from trial—and trial she did really and honestly consider the lot of a married woman. As she was the trusted depository of the thoughts of more than one of her married acquaintances; and as women, as well as men, are much more apt to confide their sorrows than their pleasures to their friends, Dorothy heard much more of the shady than of the sunny side of matrimony. As we have said then, she honestly rejoiced at the escape which she now considered certain; and when she saw a friend led to the altar, inwardly said—"Poor soul! She will soon come to Dorothy for sympathy!"

It is a common mistake, but a great one nevertheless, to imagine that all women look upon marriage as their "being's end and aim." If they did, the sex would, in their ingenuity, have discovered some mode, long ago, to revolutionize social law and custom, and to put the fair half of creation in a more advantageous way of fulfilling their destiny. Men who have the best of the bargain after marriage, have decidedly the advantage in making the contract which fixes the fate of both. I know that this doctrine will be unpalatable to "creation's lords"—but that they do not like it, does not disprove its truth.

Frederic met Dorothea day after day—at first with perfect indifference; hardly according to her the attention to which, as his sister's friend, she was fairly entitled. There was no relat to be won by attention to such a lady; and as she was very far from bespeaking, inviting, or even encouraging notice, he came at last to be perfectly at ease in her society, and to regard her as nothing more than a person whom he met as a matter of course. He withheld none of his careless remarks before her, any more than before his own sister; and in short, he became when she was by Frederic Strickland and "nobody else." Usually when a young lady is present, a young man unconsciously masquerades, but when such a perfect good understanding arises as now subsisted between our friends, there is no need of concealment. As to Dorothy she never dreamed of such a thing.

CHAPTER II.

A few months after the conversation between Frederic and his sister, that same young gentleman sat in the same apartment. When we first introduced him, he could skip about as he talked, like a man perfectly at ease. Now he appeared any thing but composed, and was most certainly very little inclined to be comfortable or to seem so. He had wandered about the room with uneasy steps—and at last seated himself and danced his feet up and down, as if he were kicking an imaginary something out of his way. In a word, he was thoughtful and fidgety. One might have supposed him in love—but he was unlucky in a worse case than that. Love, after all, is a very plain kind of a stream, with direct navigation, though the poet says it does not run smooth. A little bubbling in a current, however, only makes it more musical. Fred was not in love—and that was what ailed him.

He had been for a month or two—despite of the expostulations of his sister—indulging himself in the amusement of a flirtation with a beautiful but heartless belle—heartless except so far as vanity may be considered an affection of the heart. To him, it was mere amusement and pastime, and he was under the impression that she regarded the matter in the same light. He could relinquish the attachment at half an hour's notice, and supposed that she could do the same thing. But Fred had forgotten an important item of contrast in the relative positions of lovers of the two sexes. When a man changes his mind, he gets the reputation of having altered his views only—but the woman, unless she can make out a plain case of dismissal against her lover, is put under the not very agreeable odium of having been tried, and found wanting. Now it was true that Miss Olivia Huntley had sported a new lover for every season since her first coming out, and one might have supposed her accustomed to change—but she began now to discover that it was not wise or prudent to allow this sort of thing to go much farther. She had set her heart—that is to say, her purpose—fully, not only upon catching, but upon keeping Frederic Strickland; and while, whatever she might have hoped, she had affected to think and to speak of all previous beaux as mere danglers, she had committed herself publicly in speaking of him as something—may as a great deal more than that. And on the very day in which we now find him in such perplexity, she had spoken to him in such a way, as showed that she considered the "natural language" of his attentions as amounting to a declaration, and was ready to listen, at any time, without the affectation of any surprise, to a formal proposal. Nay she had almost said that, except as a matter of form, and to put the thing in a negotiable shape with parents and friends, the mere words of a declaration were hardly necessary. The answer, with the proper blushes, and all that, was entirely ready.

Here was a dilemma; and it was no wonder that Frederic was worried thereby. We have said that he was not in love, and herein, you perceive, lay his difficulty. Had he loved Miss Olivia, she would have been spared all the trouble of taking things for granted, and proceeding in a manner so unusual. He would have anticipated her somewhat unfeminine proceedings, and have been in the seventh heaven of happiness at the success of his suit. But inasmuch as he did not love, and so, furthermore, he had very good reason for thinking that she did not, you may calculate his misery and perplexity by counting off seven degrees on the unhappy end of the scale.

"I wish you joy, Mr. Strickland," said Dorothy, as she entered with his sister, from a walk. Fred answered with a most woe-begone look—then thinking of the ridiculous features of his position, forced a laugh, and asked,

"Joy of what, pray?"

"Bless the unsophisticated young fellow's innocent heart—does he not know!" said his sister. "Why, joy of his approaching nuptials and hymeneal happiness. The town is full of it."

"Yes," said Dorothy. "And we just met Miss Olivia, and she kissed Clara, and called her 'Sis.'"

"Don't be jealous, Fred," said Clara, as she perceived that he knit his brows. "Don't be jealous. I'm only a woman, you know."

"And a very good and sensible woman she is, too," said Dorothy. "She never will conspire with your wife against your peace."

"H-o-m-b-u-g!" slowly and distinctly enunciated Frederic, and jumping up, paced the floor with uneasy strides—looking at the girls with such an expression of serio-comico perplexity, that Dorothy, simple-hearted girl, was at her wits end to imagine what it could mean. In all her course of advice and condolence with the matrimonially inclined, she never had observed a case with precisely such symptoms as were here presented. Clara was more keen, and readily understood the case.

There is an old song—or it may be a new one, but the women say that the truth it conveys is old—which runs, "It spoils a man to marry him." And as a cognate fact it may be said that it spoils a man to get him in a love entanglement. Fred's was not, as we have more than once hinted, a love affair, but it had all the disagreeable consequences of true love, and none of its comforts. Among the other mischiefs of the predicament, it took away all Fred's prudence and manliness. You should have seen him as he sat and condoned his difficulties to Clara and Dorothy, acknowledging his flirting with all the simplicity of a child, and all the contrition of a true penitent. Clara, who feared to laugh lest it should check her brother's communicativeness, was obliged often to lock out at a window, or up at the ceiling, or down at the carpet, or into her reticule—any where, rather than at Fred's face. She was ready to burst with suppressed malicious fun, and was not at all sorry that her brother, by persisting in this flirtation, against her good advice, had entangled himself in such a difficulty. But Dorothy, good creature, sat and listened with most considerate attention and with real pity. She was as grave as an old school physician of seventy, or a homœopathic doctor of one-and-twenty, listening to a detail of symptomatic indications.

"What shall I do?" said Fred, when he had finished the relation of his troubles.

"Marry my dear sister Olivia, of course," said Clara, with mock solemnity.

Dorothea looked round at her friend with an expression of astonishment, which softened into a smile, as she perceived that Clara could not be in earnest. Fred ejaculated something like a very bad word, whose last syllable, "tion," according to Walker pronounced "shun," indicates what every one should do to such parts of speech when he meets them. There was silence for some moments.

"What shall I do?" asked Fred, again.

Dorothy had been for the last two or three minutes looking over the advertising columns of a country newspaper—as one often looks, in a quandary, at the most unlikely places for its solution. Suddenly her face lighted up with a smile—Fred forgot his troubles in wondering why he had never before perceived that her smile was as truly enchanting as it was natural and unaffected:

"Buy or lease that farm," said Dorothy, pointing to an advertisement in the paper.

"What has that to do with it?" asked Clara, perplexed.

"Dorothy, you are a Solon in—in—mustin-dulain!" shouted Fred, jumping up. "I'll do it!" And true to his impulse, he was off in a hurry. When he was gone, Dorothy explained to Clara what we will leave events to explain in our next chapter.

CHAPTER III.

"So," said a friend, to Miss Olivia, "you are really going to settle in the country."

"Me!—oh dear no. Mr. Strickland, without consulting me, has seen fit to take the Green-tree farm, but I shall cure him of that ridiculous fancy. I never will live in the country—not I. The very notion is preposterous. He must give that up, or give up Olivia Huntley."

Miss Olivia's friend was one of that particular kind of friends who never let a story spoil for lack of embellishment. Much more was said than is necessary for us to repeat—since all that was said did not amount to one-tenth of what was reported. Nor did the friend stop at half confidences. She found the war of Fred also, and provoked him to say that any woman who could not consult his taste and his happiness, was no wife for him. We are very much afraid that Frederic Strickland knew his confidence would be abused, when he said certain other things to the same friend, begging her "not to repeat them." He told her that Olivia was a great deal too much attached to him to give him up for a trifle—and that he was not disposed, by submission before marriage, to become a slave afterward, &c., &c., &c. All this, communicated to her in the strictest confidence, she related to Olivia in the same terms. In short, as one would readily suppose, the whole town was full of it. Mr. Strickland and Miss Huntley were understood, on all hands, to be in an affectionately antagonistic position.

"Don't give way!" said Olivia's friends, "or you are a hen-woman."

"I shall not," said Olivia.

"Stick to it, Fred!" said Strickland's friends, "or you are ruined for life."

Fred laughed in his sleeve, and said nothing.

Now gossip had a mouth full. Nothing was talked of for nine days, but the quarrel between Fred and Olivia. The men ranged themselves on his side, and the women on hers. Things that they did say were exaggerated, and things that they never said were invented. The result was, that on the tenth day, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, when Fred called for an explanation, that Miss Olivia Huntley and Mr. Frederic Strickland had some very cool words—some of which, Mr. Strickland understood to mean nothing more nor less than a dismissal. He, however, asked the lady if such was to be considered their meaning and purport; and was given by her to understand, that such had been her misconception of his character, and such her error in regard to his sentiments, "so little, she was persuaded, was he capable of true attachment, that if he could give no evidence to remove her disagreeable impressions and convictions, they had better become strangers"—with all the other expressions, for such cases made and provided.

"I say, girls," said Frederic, a week or two after this—"what in the name of hay-rakes and plough-shares, am I to do with this Green-tree farm, that you have swindled me into taking a lease of for ten years?"

"Sell the lease, make your peace with Olivia, hire a house in town, marry her, and move to the city," said Clara.

"Marry a sensible woman, and move upon the farm," said Dorothy.

"I will," said Fred, suddenly, "if you will take me!"

"Take him, Dorothy, do," said Clara, laughing "or he'll be out of the notion in half an hour. Shall I ring and send for the parson?"

"What nonsense!" said Dorothy, reddening—and very seldom it was that the simple-hearted Dorothy found occasion to blush. "What nonsense!"

Fred stole a peep at her face, and thought—that much greater nonsense than this might be spoken. The truth was, that Dorothy was becoming every day an object of more interest to him; and in his conduct toward her there began to be something not to be described in words, and not perhaps exactly designed by Frederic, which brought about such a state of things that Clara one day exclaimed—

"Plague take you, Fred—you are always in mischief! You've driven Dorothy away from the house, now. She has not been here for a month, except when I have fairly pulled her in."

"Why I have said or done nothing!"

"Well, it is time you did both say and do! And Dorothy is as great a simpleton as you. She is betraying her secret by pretending to treat you with indifference, and both of you, head over ears in love, are struggling like fine in treacle, only to get yourselves farther into difficulty with every effort to get out. Go speak plainly to her, like a man."

"But—sister—Clara—"

"Stuff, Fred! You don't know your own mind now, and you never did. Be off, this moment, or I'll dust you out of the house."

Fred put on his hat and walked.

The next six months the reader may imagine filled up as he pleases. Dorothy, we have sufficiently described, to disabuse the reader of any suspicion that in her movements she had any purpose of securing Frederic; or that she had even a thought that such a thing was desirable or possible. She withstood a very assiduous siege, but on, in the eyes of a sensible and truly excellent woman, Mr. Frederic Strickland found it proper to put himself on his best behavior, she developed his better qualities, and learned, impossible as the reader may have imagined it, to love him.

To cut the story short, we may now state that Mr. and Mrs. Strickland, after a year's experience, think of buying Green-tree, out and out, as the improvements they may make will then become their own.

On one pleasant Sunday, this Spring, in the little church at ———, the officiating clergyman pronounced the name—"Dor-o-the-a," very distinctly. Perhaps it amused him. It certainly amused Clara Strickland, who was one of the sponsors for the babe, to hear the name so plainly uttered. Frederic the happy father, as the party rode home, was startled with the question:

"Are you a prophet?"

"What! What are you driving at now, Clara?"

"Why Fred, you knew that the name Dorothea indicates that the bearer will possess neither grace, beauty, wit, nor wisdom."

"You everlasting tease, I do wish you were married off, out of my way!"

And so she soon will be. Miss Olivia, by the way, is Miss no longer—and in the bustle of the town, for which alone she is fit, congratulates herself that she did not wed Frederic, to make him miserable, and herself, too.

NO. II.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, BY A. LYMNER.

MR. NIGHTSHADE.

"It's the scarlet fever, Jane, I'm sure of it," said Mr. Nightshade, with a troubled look and anxious voice, as he stood with his wife beside the bed on which their little boy lay sick. He had been quite well in the morning, but after dinner drooped about, and fell asleep towards the middle of the afternoon. When Mr. Nightshade came home at dusk, Harry was moaning in his sleep, that had been prolonged to an unusual period, and had considerable fever. There was a good deal of Scarlatina about, and several children had died with it in the immediate neighborhood. This was enough to fill the heart of the nervous Mr. Nightshade with alarm.

"It's scarlet fever, Jane. There is no doubt of it. Have you sent for the doctor?"

"Not yet. I thought I would wait until you came home. I didn't feel at all alarmed. Children you know, are often attacked with slight fevers like this, which go off in a few hours."

"This is no slight fever," returned Mr. Nightshade, the shadows gathering still more deeply over his face. "I will go at once for the doctor."

"Hadn't you better wait until after tea?"

"Oh, no! I don't want any tea. It would strangle me!"

"You really give yourself unnecessary alarm, Mr. Nightshade. I don't think it any thing serious."

"Isn't scarlet fever something serious, he?"

"But we're not sure it is scarlet fever."

"I am just as sure of it as I ever was of any thing in my life. Isn't it all around us, and the air full of it? How could he help contracting the disease?"

And Mr. Nightshade hurried off for the doctor. When that individual, so welcome in sickness, but greeted with a cold shoulderishness when health bounds lightly through the veins, came, after an hour's delay, which seemed a week to the anxious Mr. Nightshade, the father watched every expression of his face, and every motion, while he examined the symptoms of little Harry.

"Well, doctor," said Mr. Nightshade, breathing thickly, "what do you think of him?"

"He has some fever," replied Esculapius.

"Do you think it scarlet fever?" anxiously enquired the father.

"I hope not."

"But hasn't he every symptom?"

"In ephemeral as well as more serious febrile affections, the first symptoms very nearly resemble each other. It is always impossible to tell in its incipiency what the course of a fever is going to be. I hope this will not prove at all alarming. I will call around in the morning, when I trust I shall find your little boy better." The doctor gave a light prescription, more for the purpose of satisfying the parents than anything else, and then went away.

Mr. Nightshade walked the floor until twelve o'clock, and it was not until long after little Harry's skin was cool and moist, that he would take off his clothes and retire to rest.

When the doctor came on the next morning, Harry was playing about and singing to himself, as lively as a cricket.

"I was sure it was nothing serious," said Mrs. Nightshade to her husband. "But you are so easily frightened."

"Better be scared than hurt," returned Mr. Nightshade, a little put out with himself for having made another exhibition of his weak side. "I'd rather be frightened fifty times at scarlet fever, than have it in the house once."

"Yes, sir; there will be war with England before three months. It's inevitable."

"I hope not, Mr. Nightshade. I think better of the good sense of both countries."

"It's more than I do, then. Yes, sir, there will be war! Look at the articles in the Times! Look at Sir Robert Peel's emphatic language; and then look at the articles in the Government organ at Washington! Neither country will yield an inch, sir! I saw that from the first. We shall all be overwhelmed in ruin. I shouldn't be surprised if there were half a dozen war steamers on our coast in ten days from this. The President's Message has done the business for us completely. In less than three months from this time, you will hear of more failures than have occurred since thirty five and six. It's just what I expected."

"But the commercial interests of the two countries are so intimately blended. There is too much at stake on both sides."

"What do politicians care about mercantile or manufacturing interests? Not the snap of a finger! They have no stake in business. No, no, sir. All they care about, is plunging the country into a war, and, in the elementary disorder and ebullitions that must follow, secure their own selfish and ambitious ends."

"I won't believe it, Mr. Nightshade. I will still look upon the bright side, and hope for the best."

"Yes, that is just the way," muttered Mr. Nightshade to himself, as he walked along with his eyes cast gloomily upon the pavement. "Just the way—no body is afraid—no body expects any evil—all look upon the bright side. But it will come in spite of all this, and then we'll see who'll make the loudest outcry. People may stick their heads under the sand like ostriches; but it won't save 'em. We shall see who's right before three months roll around!"

But, the war cloud passed over with only a distant roll of thunder. It did not break upon the two angry nations; and all soon became smiling and peaceful again. Then there was a distant rumor that the cholera had begun a westward movement. It had taken its old destructive course, and Mr. Nightshade confidently looked for its arrival at Halifax, Boston or New York, within a few weeks. His face elongated, and he asked every body he met if there was any more news of the cholera. If people smiled at his fears, he only looked the graver. It was just the way. Nobody was afraid until it was too late. He wrote several articles for the daily press, predicting the speedy advent of the terrible scourge, and calling upon the public authorities as well as citizens, to make due preparation for its reception. But no order for examining cellars and purifying the city, as he had recommended, issued from the Health Office—in fact, nothing was done. For very retribution on such sinful indifference, Mr. Nightshade expected the city to be visited almost immediately, and looked with painful forebodings to each coming Health Report, in expectation of seeing Cholera Asphyxia added to the number of diseases in that sad record of Mortality. But the fearful visitation was so long in being made, that even Mr. Nightshade's fears burnt low for want of oil to feed the flame, and at last were extinguished.

"I don't believe the boy will ever make anything, Jane. I'm out of all heart about him."

"Don't be impatient, Mr. Nightshade. Don't look for the worst. All we can do, is to prepare the earth and sow the seed. We mustn't get discouraged if it doesn't spring up as quickly as we could wish, nor endanger its growth by digging down to see if it is beginning to germinate. I have't much fear for the ultimate result."

"I have, then. I don't believe he'll turn out worth a farthing. Here he is, twelve years of age, as dull, ungainly, unpolished and rude a cub as ever was licked by a bear. I'm ashamed of him. He's got no pride, nor ambition, nor industry, nor any thing that is good, worth naming."

"For mercy's sake, Mr. Nightshade, don't talk so about the boy! Don't exaggerate his defects. Harry has many good qualities, and in a little while, they will begin to preponderate in his character. Think of his excellencies, Mr. Nightshade, and you will see much to encourage you."

"Excellencies, indeed! I should like to find some."

"Did you ever know him to tell a lie; or even to evade the truth on any pretence?"

"No."

"That's something. Harry is a truthful, honest boy. Here is good ground into which to sow good seed. Is he not generous and kind to his brothers and sisters?"

"Yes, he's kind enough."

"And unselfish?"

"Yes; there's nothing greedy about him—but——"

"His teacher has never complained of his dullness, has he?"

"No. But just look at him now. Did you ever see such an awkward position, or such a stupid face?"

"He's rather awkward, I know; but he can't well help that now. He'll get over it. As to his having such a stupid face, I must differ with you, Mr. Nightshade."

But Mr. Nightshade was out of all heart with the boy, and didn't believe he would ever come to anything.

A few years later, Harry took three or four of the highest prizes at school, in succession.

"All very well," said Mr. Nightshade, "Thankful for so much. But he has no address. He'll never get along in the world. He'll never make a man. I know it; I see it plainly enough."

At twenty-one, Harry stepped upon the world's arena, well educated, intelligent, manly in his deportment, and with address enough to carry him anywhere. There was no fears for him.

"I wouldn't have believed it," said Mr. Nightshade. "It seems hardly credible. I'm thankful, that's all I can say. I certainly never expected it."

"But you always look upon the dark side, Mr. Nightshade."

"So you are forever saying, Mrs. Nightshade, "but I don't admit it, and never did. I can see a bright side as well as any one. But when it thunders I don't leave my umbrella at home thinking it won't rain. Not I. I take heed to what is passing around me, and, foreseeing the evil, as a wise man should, hide myself; not, like a fool in the dark, dash blindly ahead and knock my brains out against a wall."

"You see," said he, anticipating my eager query as to the cause of this change, "when the power loom first began to revolve, and the tall chimnies of Manchester to rise, the poor rude looms on the banks of the Ganges, and their frugal, industrious workers, perished at a blow—but you know competition is the order of the day—the weak in these times must go to the wall."

Perceiving that I did not exactly understand the Christian spirit of this doctrine, he added, with a more earnest tone,—"Perhaps the time will come when the transition from a slow to a more speedy method of production, through the agency of machinery, will be made with some mitigation of all this sudden and unlooked for misery—but while I am moralizing my lamp is burning, and I have a score of slides to show you.

With that the lantern threw upon the wall another picture. It was an African desert, and an Arab on horseback was hunting down the swift ostrich, who with outspread wings sailed along the burning sand. At length, worn out by the greater power of endurance of his pursuer, he was taken and slain, and his capter rewarded himself for his trouble by plucking from the yet bleeding bird his waving plumage. In the distance, a caravan comes winding along towards some distant mart, to which the Arab attaches himself—the wells fail the moving multitude, and one by one man and beast fall, and leave their whitened bones as a track-mark for future travellers across the waste; but the merchandise is borne home though human life is lost.

"You would not think, to see with what negligent elegance this feather falls," said the stranger, holding up its white sweep, "that man had given even life in the struggle to bring it to this perfection. But there, what's to be done?—we always thought more of matter than of man. We have not quite finished yet," said he, taking up the framework of the bonnet, "we must go to the New World for our next picture."

As he spoke, he adjusted a new slide, and showed a Brazilian plantation, in which the slaves labored under fear of the cowhide of the overseer. "The bees who make the honey," said he, with his cold sneer, "how grateful man is to them! I suppose you think we in England have no such slaves. I have two or three choice slides here," said he, holding up the transparent glasses—"a figure or so of an exhausted milliner, and a Spitalfields weaver in his little garret, weaving inch by inch of glossy satin, whilst his own poor family have only rags to cover them; but I have shown you enough of the misery that has gone towards making this little trifle. The pretty little miss, when she puts it on, and carries it so lightly on her head, will little think how it has been delved, and forged, and woven, and built up into such becoming fashion—but 'tis worth a thought about." With that he blew lightly upon the scattered materials, and they rushed together again as speedily as they had before fallen to pieces.

"And now," said he, in the rising tone of one coming to his peroration, "I am not altogether such a bad sort of a spirit as you might have taken me to be. So I will give you a sentiment of much importance to the working bees in the busy human hive, and that is —

A HAPPIER PRODUCTION AND A JUSTER DISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH."

And clapping his magic lantern under his arm, he wished me a good evening and disappeared.

"Why, Tom," said a sweet voice close to my ear, at the same time a soft little fist thumped me on the back; "why, Tom?" said Anne, "you have been talking such strange things in your sleep this last half hour. I told you how I would be, cutting so many cuts." And truly I had gone fast asleep with my feet on the fender and saw this vision."

And now, gentle reader, do not be angry with me if, imitating the tactics of newspaper puffs, which begin with some alluring title and gradually lead on to the "Mart of Moses," or the as inevitable "Macassar," I have struck in your heart upon an universal sympathy, and thus beguiled you into the less interesting channels of social economy. But for once the puff, like the foam of the tankard, is all on the top, and it will be seen, perhaps, that there is more substance in the matter below than the title warrants. Considering how important a portion of the community are the productive classes, it is no slight matter that we endeavor to rid their daily occupation as much as possible of the needless repulsiveness and danger that in too many cases at present attaches to them. As for the proposition of "A better distribution of wealth," it has occupied the attention of all the most enlightened economists, but they have looked upon it as a thing rather to be desired than capable of accomplishment. In the various joint stock associations, however, and mutual benefit societies, which have spread lately so widely among the middle and working classes, by which profits are diffused through the masses, instead of centering in large capitalists, one of the methods in which the problem is to be worked is perhaps hit upon. The subject, however, is so wide a one, that most probably I shall return to it again.

Selected Poetry.

IF THOU HAST LOST A FRIEND.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

If thou hast lost a friend,
By hard or hasty word,
Go, call him in thy heart again;
Let pride no more be heard.
Remind him of those happy days,
Too beautiful to last;
Ask, if a word should cancel years
Of truth and friendship past?
Oh! if thou'st lost a friend,
By hard or hasty word,
Go,—call him to thy heart again;
Let pride no more be heard.

Oh! tell him, from thy thought
The light of joy hath fled;
That, in thy sad and silent breast,
Thy lonely heart seems dead;
That mount and vale,—each path ye trod,
By morn or evening dim,
Reproach you with their frowning gaze,
And ask your soul of him.
Then, if thou'st lost a friend,
By hard or hasty word,
Go,—call him to thy heart again;
Let pride no more be heard.

THE WEDDING BONNET. A VISION.

BY ANDREW WINTER.

I was the other day in the company of half a dozen young ladies—gentle cousins—all of them as merry as little larks as busy as lamp-lighters, and as important as the preparation for that great event in female life—a wedding—could make them. The bride's bonnet had just come home, and I had the satisfaction of seeing a dozen lily-white hands all in one tumultuous group, arranging and shaping it to the face of the fair maid herself. It was pronounced on all hands quite the thing—a love of a bonnet, in fact; and after having deposited it in the centre of the table, and hunted under the sofa and all quarters of the room to make sure the cat was not there, they left me with an especial charge not to touch it for the world. I promised accordingly, as I sat dozing before the fire, and they left me alone to pursue their welcome task. Presently a knock came to the door; it speedily opened, and a strange gentleman in respectable black entered with a magic lantern under his arm. Somehow or other I was not a bit astonished at his entrance, but took it quite as a matter of course. "So you have a bride's bonnet here," said he, looking at me with his keen gray eyes; "all smiles and happiness, I suppose?"

"Yes," said I, as though he had been the oldest friend in the world, "little Anne ——"

"Ah!" said he, stopping me, "people must marry, I suppose; but I have a word to say to you about this gimcrack." And stepping up to the bonnet, he turned up his cuffs like an expert chemical lecturer, took it into his hands, blew upon it, and as quickly as a child's card house rattles to the ground, the bonnet lay in pieces before him. Satin, blush-rose, feather, frame-work, and the very cotton with which it was sewed, lay grouped under his hands. He then deliberately wiped the illuminated lens of his magic lantern.—"Let us begin," said he, "from the beginning," taking in his grizzly fingers the blush-rose, and stripping its stem until the iron wire of which it was composed was laid bare. Before even this thread of metal can be produced, men must dive into the bowels of the earth, to procure the ore and the fuel with which to smelt it. "I will show you the true history of the making of this bonnet." With that he turned the focus of the lantern upon the wall, and I saw a picture of a deep pit into which men continually kept entering and so continually emerging from, like so many ommets, black and filthy to the last degree; and further in the mine, trailing up deep ascents, women on their hands and knees, with chains round their bodies, dragged up the heavy corves of coal."

"But this," said I, "surely is not fit employment for women?"

"Well," said he, with a shrug, as if mimicking a general expression, "what's to be done? Somebody must do it."

With that he changed the slides, and I saw a child, not more than five years old, sitting in a narrow little passage in the remotest darkness of the mine. I saw him pull something he held in his hand, a little door opened and the woman harnessed to the corve passed onward; the door shut too, and the child was again in the darkness, huddled up in the corner to protect himself from the cold and damp. Noticing my surprise, my strange visitant shrugged his shoulders again in his expressive manner. "Well, 'tisn't a pleasant business, certainly," said he, "but the thing must be done, you know! But stop, we have only got as far as the coal in our lecture."

With that he again changed the slides, and the next picture he showed me was a roaring furnace, out of which leaped and sparkled into the moulds the molten metal, like a gnome escaping into the earth from which it had been abducted. Workmen stood by, lit up in the glare, the sweat running from them in great drops; with the courage of heroes they seemed to defy the blistering heat.

"How," said I, "can these poor fellows stand such a life?"

"They don't," said he, with his sly sneer, "it soon uses them up, but there are plenty more in the 'labor market.' What so cheap as flesh and blood? But we have forged the tough iron and spun the fine wire. Now for the artist's touch.

As he spoke, a fresh slide rattled through the lantern; and in a mean room, I saw a poor girl, winding delicate gauze round the iron wire, and with wan fingers, mocking nature in one of her most beautiful moods. As she added petal after petal to the rose she was making, she stole hour after hour from the night. "You see," said he, "she tints the flower from the color of her own poor cheek. Alas! that the human rose should decay that this artificial thing might flourish?" He said this sadly, but immediately added in his usual tone, "but there—what's to be done? The pay is slow starvation, I admit; but these women crowd the labor market so, that they are glad enough to slave even at this work—if not, a worse fate awaits them."

"But we have only got as far as the flower in our lecture," he said, and held out the blush-rose he had taken from the bonnet; he then put it aside with the triumphant air of one who had just made a successful demonstration.

"Here," said he, holding up a piece of the glazed calico lining, "I will show you something interesting about this," and immediately threw out upon the wall a picture which differed from all that had gone before it. Tall palms, and all the luxuriant vegetation of the East shot up. Then a village was seen upon the banks of the Ganges. In the open air workmen sat at their looms weaving cloth, and singing as they wove.

"Have you noised the scene enough?" said he. I nodded, the picture dissolved, and instead of the former scene of beauty and industry, I saw a village in ruins, through which the wild dog alone roamed, and the jungle grew up to its very feet.

"You see," said he, anticipating my eager query as to the cause of this change, "when the power loom first began to revolve, and the tall chimnies of Manchester to rise, the poor rude looms on the banks of the Ganges, and their frugal, industrious workers, perished at a blow—but you know competition is the order of the day—the weak in these times must go to the wall."

Perceiving that I did not exactly understand the Christian spirit of this doctrine, he added, with a more earnest tone,—"Perhaps the time will come when the transition from a slow to a more speedy method of production, through the agency of machinery, will be made with some mitigation of all this sudden and unlooked for misery—but while I am moralizing my lamp is burning, and I have a score of slides to show you.

With that the lantern threw upon the wall another picture. It was an African desert, and an Arab on horseback was hunting down the swift ostrich, who with outspread wings sailed along the burning sand. At length, worn out by the greater power of endurance of his pursuer, he was taken and slain, and his capter rewarded himself for his trouble by plucking from the yet bleeding bird his waving plumage. In the distance, a caravan comes winding along towards some distant mart, to which the Arab attaches himself—the wells fail the moving multitude, and one by one man and beast fail, and leave their whitened bones as a track-mark for future travellers across the waste; but the merchandise is borne home though human life is lost.

"You would not think, to see with what negligent elegance this feather falls," said the stranger, holding up its white sweep, "that man had given even life in the struggle to bring it to this perfection. But there, what's to be done?—we always thought more of matter than of man. We have not quite finished yet," said he, taking up the framework of the bonnet, "we must go to the New World for our next picture."

As he spoke, he adjusted a new slide, and showed a Brazilian plantation, in which the slaves labored under fear of the cowhide of the overseer. DISCUSSION ON GAMBLING.

The discussion on Gambling between Mr. Green, the Reformed gambler, and Mr. Freeman, of the "Profession," which has been looked forward to with so much interest, opened upon Monday evening. The audience generally, however, were rather disappointed, inasmuch as Mr. Freeman stated that he did not come there to defend gambling, but only to prove the folly and injustice of attempting to put it down by making its practice by professional gamblers, an offence, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. But although Mr. Freeman made this avowal, he evidently did attempt in various parts of the discussion, to defend gambling—not, however, as a thing good in itself, but as being no worse than many other practices which society tolerates, and which no man loses his reputation, or is in danger of imprisonment, for engaging in.

We have no scruple in confessing, that we were much interested in Mr. Freeman. He appears to be one of a singular class of men, some one of whom may be found in nearly every pursuit, however dishonorable. Men of keen and subtle minds, and of as much goodness and honesty of purpose as is possible in the life which they have chosen, or into which perhaps they have been in a degree forced. In the course of his remarks, he made one allusion to his own history, which while it told as much as anything that was said in the course of the debate against gambling, opened unto us in a degree the secret of his present position. He said that when he was a young man, he had lost his all at the gaming table, and that from that blow he had never recovered—"it had broken his heart." And yet, strange anomaly, he now not only makes his living by gambling, but stands up before the world as its defender.

But let us look a little further into Mr. Freeman's arguments. He did not state them very plainly, being evidently unaccustomed to public speaking, and, as the English say, to "thinking on his legs," but if we are not mistaken, he reasons in his own heart as follows. Gambling in cards is not right absolutely, but it is the same in principle as gambling in stocks, in breadstuffs, in merchandise, in land, or in anything else. None of these are right, but they are necessary fruits of the folly and wicked sins of men, and inevitable in the present condition of society. "I make my living, I know," he probably says, "from the weakness and wickedness of my fellow men; but so do the physician, the judge, the lawyer, the jailer, and the hangman." If we are not mistaken, in this way does Mr. Freeman make out a clear case to his own conscience; and to some small extent he is right in what he asserts. To gamble with cards, is the same in principle as to gamble with stocks, or anything else—the difference is only one of degree; but although the gambler and the judge, both live in a certain sense off of the vices of their fellow men, the difference is very evident between him whose business conduces to increase these vices, and his whose noble office it is to lessen them.

But Mr. Freeman complains that, while the gambler with cards is persecuted by society, and branded with all marks of shame, and laws passed to imprison him if found practising his art, the gambler in stocks is neither reviled nor imprisoned. At the rank injustice, as he, in our opinion, honestly believes it, of this course on the part of society, he can hardly contain his indignation. Those "uncouth gestures," as one of our contemporaries designates them, were not in our opinion intended for effect, but were the natural language of uncontrollable indignation at what he believes to be the rank injustice of society, which he could not adequately express in words. The audience laughed, but the speaker was far from laughing—a perfect tempest of conflicting emotions, it seemed to us, was agitating his bosom. Strange as it may sound to our readers, he evidently thought his cause was lost, and wanted to make it appear so, not to the gamblers and their friends, hundreds of whom were present, and ready at any moment with their applause, but to the crowd of intelligent, virtuous men and women, in whose audience he stood. We saw the breaking out of this feeling in the half-contemptuous manner in which he alluded to the tastes of gamblers in general, as contrasted with his own—"he did not keep the company of gamblers; he had nothing to say against them, but his tastes were different."

But is it unjust to punish the gambler with cards by imprisonment and public proscription, while the gambler in stocks, &c., whose crime is the same in principle, though not in degree, goes unwhipt of justice? Undoubtedly it is, for it is no reason that one vice should go unpunished, because another is able to escape, for the present. Mr. Freeman's argument is very good, so far as it applies to inflicting upon the gambler in stocks the same penalty as on himself; but the law of Progress, and the best interests of society, demand that these things should never be allowed to work backwards. For the way society advances, is simply this—the worst manifestations of vice are first prescribed, and then their prescription is made a stepping stone to the multitude. For instance—we attack gambling with cards, the worst manifestation of the gambling principle; we make it obnoxious to the moral sense of the world; we do manfully it, and justly, but with robbery, that fertile parent from which grew up in that faith, and all the effects of limited equity, try never be able henceforward to separate them to the popular apprehension. Having done this, in the course of some fifty or one hundred years, certain dealings in stocks, for instance, are called in question. If they can be proved to be rightly described by the phrase "GAMBLING IN Stocks," the battle is half won. For the prescription of the worst kind of Gambling, has given a vantage ground from which to attack the principle of gambling wherever found. And this, we say, is the only Law of Progress.

Another ground taken by Mr. Freeman was that "a man has a right to do what he chooses with his own, if in so doing he does not injure anybody else." In a limited sense, this is true, doubtless—but he does injure somebody else if he fails to perform his duties to his family, or to his country. For instance, he has no right to commit suicide. But Gambling cannot be done without injuring somebody else, as it takes two to play at it—leaving out of view the injury done to society at large, as Mr. Green has shown in his various works on the subject. But there is no necessity in dwelling upon this point—it cannot be defended for a moment.

As to Mr. Green's part in the discussion, it is not necessary to say much. He has our confidence and sympathy. We consider his present course a most noble one, and wish him all success in his efforts to overthrow the abominable vice from whose clutches he has come forth a reformed man.

We have taken up considerable room with this subject, because we feel great interest in both parties engaged in the discussion. Did Mr. Freeman appear to be only a bold, bad man, we should hardly have wasted a single paragraph upon him or his arguments. But he is evidently a man of considerable information and talent, and to all appearance, strange as it may sound, of much sincerity and cross-grained honesty. That he may be led to forsake his present pursuits, before his gray hairs shall have gone down to a dishonored grave, is our fervent wish and prayer.

THEORIES UPON POPULATION.

We were never a believer in the Malthusian theory of population—we never could bring ourselves to think that starvation was the natural check upon the too rapid increase of human beings; or could comfort ourselves, when we read distressing accounts of the condition of the lower classes in European countries, with the thought that there was no help for it, that they were dying according to the law of God, as propounded by Malthus—no, we always preferred to go rather with the heart in its denials of so stern and horrible a doctrine, then with the head, even when its deductions seemed clearest and most unanswerable. And now, if we are not misinformed, (at least it is so stated in the "Vestiges of Creation,") the Malthusian theory is given up by the best minds, in well nigh dead and thrust into its grave—and room made for other and more Christian theories. The people, in this matter, have had a triumph over the philosophers; or, in other words, heart has carried it triumphantly in opposition to head, and we trust we shall hear no more of people starving "because it cannot be helped," "because population has outrun the means of subsistence," when horses and dogs have plenty to eat every day, and thousands of acres lie from year to year untilled.

Population outrun the means of subsistence—it never has been the case yet, and we do not believe that it ever will be, or is possible. Population increases rapidly, we know, in times of peace, but not so rapidly as the means of production. As to manufactures, there is no limit to the speed of production that may be attained with the means already developed, and doubtless many new agencies will be discovered; while as to the products of the earth,—putting aside the increased productiveness that may be effected by more careful farming, and by an increased knowledge of the principles of manuring—who can pretend to say that a means may not be discovered of accelerating the growth of crops, so as to have two to every one we now have. Have we not already had glimpses into the possibility of so hastening the growth of plants by means of the electric or magnetic fluid, as to warrant us in supposing that something of this kind may ultimately be effected upon a large scale. It is easy to laugh at such questionings of the future, but who would not have laughed twenty, yes, ten years ago, at the Magnetic Telegraph?

Whether, however, there be any plausibility in this view or not, one thing is certain—that the discoveries and inventions of the last fifty years, are such as to do away with all fears, for some centuries, at least, as to this world's ability to clothe and feed its inhabitants. And, for ourselves, we have no fear that if men will only do what is right, they will always be able to get enough to eat and to drink, even if in the course of time it becomes necessary to "annex" to this globe some other Planet.

But we were led into these remarks upon the Malthusian theory, &c., by the following account of a new theory respecting Population; for which we are indebted to the London correspondent of the National Intelligencer:—

Some new ideas on population have been broached by Mr. Doubleday, in a publication lately made by him, entitled "The True Law of Population." This law of population, he endeavors to show, is connected with and depends upon the nature of the food of the people. Mr. Doubleday says "his theory is founded on the admissions of all medical and physiological authorities of modern times, and supported by many of ancient times, and is corroborated by an appeal to living generations." He affirms that "populations are uniformly found thin in pastoral countries, where the food is animal food chiefly; denser, where it is mixed partially with vegetable element; denser still, where it is vegetable only, but with plenty; and densest of all where it is vegetable, but not scarcely supportable!"

The examples which the author quotes from the history and condition of the world go far toward establishing his theory. If he be correct, the true remedy for excessive numbers is not emigration, but plentiful and nourishing food. He divides society into three classes—"the worst dieted, the moderately dieted, and the luxuriously dieted;" and observes "that it is upon the numerical proportion which these three states bear to each other in any society, that increase or decrease on the whole depends." Mr. Doubleday's argument derives considerable support from the decay of opulent families and their rapid extinctions. We have abundant evidence of this at various epochs, and in different countries.

Tacitus gives us one instance in the reign of the Emperor Claudius. If we turn to England, we shall find that, but for comparatively new creations, both the peerage and baronetage of England would have been extinct. The number of English peers in 1837 was three hundred and fifty, of which two hundred and forty-seven had been created since 1760. The decay of the baronets has been more remarkable still. So that if no new peers had been created since 1760, the present number would have been only one hundred and three, and but for the perpetual new creations, there would scarcely have been a baronet left. Mr. Malthus noticed a similar decay in the higher and wealthier families of Berne, in Switzerland; and Mr. Sadler cited Addison's authority to prove the extraordinary decrease of the Venetian nobility.

WORKS ON GAMBLING.

We desire to call particular attention to three works on Gambling, which the reader will find noticed in our Book column. The author of these, Mr. J. H. Green, a reformed gambler, will be remembered by our readers as a gentleman of whom they have seen various notices in connection with the passage of laws by several States, more effectually to break up the odious business in which he was formerly engaged. Mr. Green's life has been a most eventful one, and his biography has all the interest of a romance; while the light he throws upon the mysteries and evils of gambling, should be sufficient to deter every one from touching a card. We find no idea, before looking through these books of the perfect mastery ever his victim possessed by the accomplished gambler. There is no luck at all in the matter. Whether the gambler wins or loses is at his own pleasure. If the latter, it is because he wishes to lure his victim on, or to prevent his becoming frightened before he is totally ruined. We think that society owes very much to Mr. Green for the noble efforts he is making with tongue and pen, to open the eyes of his fellow men, especially of the young, to the misery that daily results from an indulgence in this fascinating vice.

THE AMERICAN FARMER.

This is the name of a valuable Agricultural journal, to which we are often indebted for interesting information. Those of our subscribers who may wish a publication of the kind, will find the Farmer a very good one. It is published monthly by Samuel Sands, Baltimore, Md., at one dollar per annum.

DWELLINGS FOR THE POOR.

An association of gentlemen in New York, have asked for an act of incorporation from the Legislature, for the purpose of enabling them to combine capital, so as to erect tenements on a plan to suit the wants of the laboring classes, at a reduced rent. They think they can put up buildings which will combine more comfort, with less expense.

We are inclined to see this experiment in our sister city, and hope it will not be long before we are called upon to chronicle one of a similar character in Philadelphia. In walking through the districts of our city, we have often thought how much good a wealthy man, or a company of wealthy men, might do in this way—putting up blocks of dwellings, not to rack, and letting them out at not more than a small interest for the money invested. English benevolence already has begun to flow in this channel, and a whole town, (Birkenhead, opposite Liverpool,) has been created upon this principle. And whatever objection may be made to various other schemes of benevolence, the usefulness of bettering the outward condition of the poor in this way, cannot be found fault with to by the most captious.

Of all efforts aiming to improve the outward condition of man, we think most highly—for a healthy body, a sufficiency of employment, good wages, and comfortable dwellings, are almost necessary foundations upon which to build habits of temperance, kindness, morality, and true piety. In relation to this subject, one fact in the history of our Saviour, has always struck us most forcibly—He went about doing good, not only to the minds, but to the bodies of men. He healed the sick, He cast out evils (demons, in the old dialect,) of various characters. He had compassion on the multitude because they hungered; in one word, He gazed upon the outward as well as on the inward sufferings of man with a most divine compassion. In accordance with His own conduct, was the doctrine of that parable, in which He speaks of the questions that shall be asked each of us at the last day. They allude nearly altogether to deeds of practical righteousness—to clothing the naked, to feeding the hungry, to visiting those that are sick and in prison—and the words of the parable run, "For, inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

MAILS TO EUROPE.

The arrangements for a regular conveyance of mails to and from Europe are partly completed. The Washington, the first steamship of the line, will leave New York for Cowes and Bremen Haven, on Tuesday, the first day of June next; and, also, on the first day of each second month thereafter. It is expected that the second steamship will be ready to depart in the course of the season, on the first day of each intermediate month, thus furnishing a monthly mail in each direction. The following are the rates of postage:—

The inland postage to the city of New York, as well as the postage by steamer from New York, is to be prepaid on all mailable matter to be conveyed by this line, excepting that addressed to foreign ports, or places to which said matter will pass through the Bremen post-office. Hamburg is not included in this exception. To Bremen and to the points supplied through that office, unpaid letters, &c., may be sent; postage to be collected at Bremen.

The rates of postage established by the act of March 3, 1845, "to provide for the transportation of the mail between the United States and foreign countries," are on the above route, as follows:

Upon all letters and packages not exceeding one-half ounce in weight, twenty-four cents; over one-half ounce in weight, and not exceeding one ounce, forty-eight cents; and for every additional half ounce or fraction of an ounce, fifteen cents.

Upon each newspaper, pamphlet, and price current, three cents.

Inland postages, in all cases, to be added, wherever the matter is transported by mail within the United States.

THE RIGHT KIND OF "HELP."

The Prairie Farmer tells of a dinner party, a short time since, in Jacksonville, Illinois, where many of the "first men" of the State, with their families, were present; but not a sample of domestic "help," falsely so called, was there to wait on them. In place of such "helps," the Farmer says, "the daughters of the guests—misses just beginning their teens, with bright, sweet faces, and twinkling curls, and sparkling eyes, were there, and did the service; and their presence, like a May sunshine, constituted more than half the pleasure of the entertainment."

Certainly it did! breakfast, dinner, or supper, never tastes so well as when prepared by the hands of those you love. It is as if the bright eyed cooks had seasoned the viands with their own sweet smiles, and breathed into the tea or coffee a more delicious flavor, and made the clear, cold water sparkle more than common, with watching it intently that it might not spill, as they brought it from the spring or the well. Aye! commend us to such a meal above all that were ever cooked by the hardiest female "help" this side the "old countries"—as for men cooks and waiters, we would as leave have hottentots and baboons, at once.

DR. CHAPMAN'S ADDRESS.

Dr. Chapman, upon taking his seat as President of the American Medical Association, is reported in several of the daily papers of this city, to have made the following remarks:—

He said he could find no language to express the depth of his gratitude. It had often been his good fortune during his professional life to have been complimented in the same manner, though not in the same degree. He confessed his incompetency to serve the association. He said he loved his profession, and should be ungrateful if he did not; what ever he possessed in this life, had been bestowed by her favors; when he forgot her, or deserted her and her disciples, he remarked with great emphasis, may Almighty God forget us.

The whole of the above address is in bad taste, because it is not simple and truthful, but artificial and false—and should the concluding sentence is rank profanity. No man has a right to call down such imprecations upon his head if he fails in his duty, in any case, much less in that of simple assuming the presidential chair of a medical association.

HAYDON'S OPINION OF THE "FRIENDS."

The editor of the N. Y. Mirror says that he stumbled recently upon a noble bundle of autographs, among which was the following note written by Haydon, the painter, a short time before he committed suicide. Would that he himself had been able to adopt the Christian philosophy of calmness and resignation he so much admires in the "Friends!"

"Voltaire said the Quakers were the only Christians in essence and practice; as I have had to do with all sects and classes, I am inclined to think he was not altogether wrong, though not entirely right. I have known many good Christians who were not Quakers, and many Quakers not Christians, but still, on the whole, I am persuaded from long experience, thy society is more sincere in its endeavors to carry out the doctrines of Christ than many others (most others) who have more pretensions—and I have often wished I could subdue violent emotions with the peace, and quiet, and humility I have witnessed amongst friends.

"Believe me, with respect,

"B. R. HAYDON."

IRON COACHES.

We see it stated that a gentleman of Aberdeen, Scotland, has taken out a patent for the manufacture of iron coaches. His trial omnibus, carrying nineteen persons, besides the driver, weighs only eleven cwt., and can be drawn by two ordinary horses at the rate of ten miles an hour. This application of iron to the manufacture of coaches has just come up at the very nick of time, as we perceive that the "fat men," at the head of whom stands (ex officio) the Honorable Dixon H. Lewis, of Alabama, have declared war against all descriptions of wooden carriages. As a proof of this, we would mention that Mr. Lewis, in getting into a carriage lately, at Washington, broke out the bottom of it by his great weight. The sight of his two legs sticking out beneath the carriage, is stated to have been a curious sight to the "outside barbarians." These iron coaches, however, will match him.

SENTENCE OF LIEUTENANT HUNTER.

We see it stated that Lieut. Hunter, who captured Alvarado, has been found guilty of disobeying orders, and sentenced to be reprimanded and dismissed from the squadron. The reprimand to be read on the quarter deck of every ship in the squadron.

Some of our contemporaries uphold Lieut. Hunter in his disobeying of orders, but until some proof appears that the service would have suffered by his adhering to the strict letter of his instructions, our own course must be widely different. Of course, we do not pretend to give any opinion as to the justice of the above sentence, as we have not the evidence before us that was given in before the court-martial. It seems too harsh for the offence, but it may not be.

LIPPARD VS. HEADLEY.

We have received the following communication from George Lippard, which we publish as much as an evidence that in our course relative to certain of his productions, we have been imposed upon by personal or other unworthy motives, as for any other reason:

To the Editor of the Saturday Post:

Will you have the kindness to refer to the Saturday Courier of December 16, 1846, and examine an article by George Lippard, entitled "The Black House and his Rider, or Who was the Hero of Santiago," and compare it with Mr. Headley's "Arnold at Rossitt's Heights," published in your last.

You will there find, that the scene which I gave to Arnold's house, was literally copied word for word by Mr. H. I mentioned the name of Warner on the house, as Arnold was half the country of the hero in deep conference, and an aged woman sent $500 to the children of the dead patriot.

You will also discover that my very language is copied, particularly the extract of Arnold's speech to soldiers, and such "Your sires took arms at Quebec—you in the Wilderness—now on Chapultepec, &c. &c."

Similar language to this can be found in no history, or romance, previous to my article, entitled, "The Black House, &c. &c." This Magazine was not only published in the Courier of the 16th of December, 1846, but was one of the main points of my lecture, before the Writ Institute, December 16, 1846.

I merely adduce these passages in order to refer you more particularly to other parts of the respective narratives, which bear an astonishing similarity.

You will do me the justice to make this examination, and believe me, I write with no spirit of ill-feeling toward Mr. Headley.

GEORGE LIPPARD.

We have looked at the article, entitled "The Black House and His Rider," and feel no hesitancy in saying, that if "similar language can be found in no history or romance," it appears very probable that Mr. Headley is indebted to the article in question for the two instances of resemblance to which Mr. Lippard specially refers. There is also considerable similarity in the general account of the battle, and the conduct of Arnold on the occasion, the main difference being in point of style. How far this resemblance is owing to both accounts having been derived from the same original sources, we have no means of determining.

EXPENSES OF THE ROYAL FAMILY.

A correspondent of the Inquirer of this city, who signs himself "Britannicus," states that the British Nation is a gainer instead of a loser by the Royal Family. He calls attention to the fact that the Crown acquired in the old Feudal times immense possessions, which remained in the hands of the Royal Family, until the death of George II, in 1760, when it was deemed expedient both by the King and People, that they should be exchanged for a fixed annual allowance, to be paid in money to the latter. He says:—

Since that period the whole property has been under the management of certain officers, called "Commissioners of Woods and Forests," and its proceeds carried to the public account. That the Nation has no right to complain of the bargain will, I think, be admitted by all who may take the trouble of perusing the following account, for the accuracy of which I can vouch from my own knowledge:

Amount of Hereditary Revenues received from the Crown Lands and carried to public account from 1760 to 1837,	£116,000,000
Sums expended during that period on the Royal Family,	£65,000,000
	51,000,000

Being an annual gain to the public for 77 years, of £661,323 per annum.

I have had no opportunity of investigating the Crown Land account since 1837, but have every reason to believe that the property has even increased—say, greatly increased—in annual value.

THE RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

The Washington Union gives the following as an expedient route for a Railroad to the Pacific. It says that "nearly all of it has been traversed by our troops, accompanied by officers of our enterprising corps of topographical engineers, whose opinions are decidedly in favor of the practicability of the undertaking—being throughout exempt from serious difficulties, and passing through a country capable of sustaining a dense population."

Leaving the Mississippi river, about 100 miles above the city of New Orleans, the distance from thence to the excellent harbor of San Diego, on the Pacific, will not be found to differ much from 1,500. Or, taking the city of New Orleans as the starting point, and continuing the road up the banks of the Mississippi, to a point from which it would be necessary to diverge across the country, the distance and length of railroad would be about 1,600 miles. On either supposition New Orleans would be the great depot on this side. Crossing the State of Louisiana, the railroad would then pass over the better part of the State of Texas to the vicinity of the Rio Grande, or Del Norte. From this vicinity there is already a practical wagon track across the mountain range to the valley of the Gila, thence down the valley of this river to the Colorado of California Bay; thence across to San Diego.

THE TEA GROWING EXPERIMENT.

We see by the Foreign News that the great Tea growing experiment, undertaken by the East India Company, has succeeded even beyond their expectations.

The tea produced at the farm of Kumoor, is described as equal to the finest Chinese, and has proved very profitable. It has sold on the spot at the highest price of the best imported Chinese. The climate, the produce, and the identity of the plant, are beyond a doubt. One hundred and seventy-six acres only have been as yet cultivated, but 1,000,000 of acres are now open to capital and enterprise, capable of supplying one-sixth of the consumption of Great Britain and Ireland. The cultivation is described as not being difficult, and the returns certain. Tea grown by anybody else than the Chinese, is something new under the sun.

TAR AND FEATHERS.

A correspondent of the Penn. Freeman of this city, gives the following account of the origin of the practice of Tarring and Feathering:—

It boasts a royal genealogy. In the English Penny Magazine, No. 77, August, 1833, we are told that the first fleet which left England for a foreign expedition was that of Richard the 1st, for the Holy Land. The ordinances of Chinon were promulged for it. They are found in the 1st vol. of Rymer's Foedera. One of them runs thus:

"The thief convicted of stealing shall be clipped in the manner of a champion, and boiling pitch thrown over his head, and feathers from a pillow shaken over him, that he may be known, and he shall be thrown upon the first shore at which the ships touch. Witness ourself at Chinon."

What new thing is there under the sun?

INCOMBUSTIBLE COTTON.

More discoveries probably have been made in science and art by accident and fortunate blunders, than in any other way. As a late instance of this fortunate stumbling upon a truth, we notice that a physician in Georgia, is attempting to prepare gun cotton from a receipt sent to him, found to his astonishment, that his cotton not only would not explode, but would not even ignite. He repeated the process and the result was the same. He therefore now claims to have discovered a method of rendering cotton incombustible, at a very small expense. He further alleges that the texture of the cotton is not injured in the least, and is therefore as capable of being made into clothing as before the operation. This, it appears to us, is a discovery of considerable importance.

CORSETS.

Two items of news in relation to the above "lady killers," are before us. One states that the French women, that is, the well-formed of them, "in the insolent confidence of beauty," do not now wear corsets at all. The second item is that a servant girl was found dead in her bed, at Montreal, recently; her death being occasioned by sleeping in tight stays, to preserve her shape. We commend these two items to those of our lady readers who wear corsets, if it be possible that any such can be found among the intelligent patrons of the Post.

FLOW OF WIT.

On last Monday morning every one of the daily papers of this city contained the same witticism upon the capture of Santa Anna's cork leg. The point of the witticism was the use of the phrase "leg-bail." The consternation of the various editors in each finding that his brethren were equally wide awake as to the important purpose to which the leg in question might be put, is represented as being even more laughable than the joke itself.

THE STATE INTEREST.

The State Treasurer of Pennsylvania has again addressed his circular to the various counties of the State, urging the repetition of endeavors to provide means for the payment of the interest due on the State debt, on the first of August next. Pennsylvania, upon such occasions, expects every man to do his duty, and not let our good old State swing a moment behindhand.

MR. MAFFITT.

The Committee authorized to investigate the charges against Mr. Maffitt, have reported, as we learn from the "Christian Advocate and Journal," that, "according to the decision of Bishops Hedding and Janes, Mr. Maffitt is not a member of the Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church; also, that he is not a member of the Norfolk Street Church; and, according to the Discipline, cannot be received as a member in any church, without such a certificate; as he has lost his his position, and which he could not now obtain."

If we understand correctly the meaning of the above, it is that Mr. Maffitt has been deposed from the ministry, and cut off from church fellowship, in the Methodist Church.

FROM A SUBSCRIBER.

No compliments are more valued by the editor of a paper, than such as come from his readers. The certainty of their being disinterested and heartfelt, gives them a peculiar value in his eyes. The following, which we received a few days ago, is an instance of the kind manner in which many of our subscribers, when sending on their subscriptions, speak of the Post. It is from a reverend gentleman in Elmira, N. Y.:—

"To my Family's Friend,

The Saturday Evening Post,

"Enclosed I send two dollars as my yearly payment for the best Weekly in the range of my reading; and am very respectfully, Yours, &c."

NEW YORK ELECTION.

It appears that the recent election in New York upon the License question, was by no means general. In order to have a new vote taken, it was necessary that one-fourth of the voters should petition for it—and in many of the very strong "No License" towns, the "License" party made no issue this year. It is probable, therefore, that if the vote had been more general, the triumph of the "License" party would not have appeared so complete. Such, at least, is the explanation we see given in the N. Y. Tribune.

EXCESSIVE WEALTH.

The N. Y. Dispatch says:

The evils of excessive wealth will soon become so apparent, and so odious, that men will voluntarily pledge themselves never to accumulate above a certain quantity of property; and men who go beyond the mark, instead of being honored and respected for it, will be universally despised, and treated as little better than cheats, swindlers and robbers of their fellow men.

Do you believe the above, reader? We have it under consideration.

A PIRATE OR PRIVATEER.

The schr. Thomas Hooper, Captain Green, on her course to New York from Jamaica, saw a low black hermaphrodite brig (not schooner) crowded with men, which was supposed to be either a pirate or a Mexican privateer. The brig gave chase, but the schooner was too swift footed for her. A ship and barque which were seen by Capt. Green, are believed by him to have been taken by the brig.

New Publications.

OMOO: A NARRATIVE OF ADVENTURES IN THE SOUTH SEAS. By Herman Melville, author of "Typee." New York: Harper & Brothers. This is a most fascinating book. The novelty and wild beauty of the scenes described, and the freshness and levelness of the writer's style, keep up an interest from the first page to the last equal to that which chains us to a captivating romance. A former work of Mr. Melville's, "Typee," was supposed to be really a romance of the Robinson Crusoe school; but it seems that the author is actually a traveller, and speaks from what he has seen and felt. The present work is a continuation of "Typee." This last we have not read, but the glowing eulogies that it won from all quarters are just such as we should use in speaking of Omoo. Whenever a passage of description occurs in the course of the narrative, there is such a happy appreciation and vivid picturing of personal beauty as to flash before you the full glory of tropical scenery, and set the imagination even of sober, home loving people like ourselves, all aglow with the thought of wandering in these paradisical regions. It seems such exquisite physical enjoyment, that we do not wonder at the instances of civilized men renouncing forever the comforts of cultivated life, to revel in the wild freedom, the unbought spontaneous luxuries afforded by the delicious climate of these islands. We should almost be afraid to place Omoo in the way of a young adventurous spirit, lest it tempt him, like Tennyson's ill-starred misadventurer of Locksley Hall,

"To burst all links of habit—there to wander far away,
On from island unto island at the gateways of the day;
Larger constellations burning, mellow moons and happy skies,
Breathe of tropic shade and palms in cluster, knots of Paradise.

Never comes the trader, never floats an European flag,
Slides the bird o'er lustrous woodland, droops the trailer from the crag;
Droops the heavy-blossomed flower, hangs the heavy-fruited tree—
Summer isles of Eden lying in dark-purple spheres of sea."

A GRAMMAR OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE; ADAPTED TO THE SCHOOLS OF AMERICA. By Joseph E. Chandler, Editor of the United States Gazette. Philadelphia: Thomas, Cowperthwaite & Co. Mr. Chandler has for many years had the reputation of being one of the best grammarians in the country, and confidence in his reputation has been submitted to his decision, as the "Grammar King." It seems the most natural thing in the world, therefore, that he should write a book upon his favorite subject. As it would however be the height of presumption in us—who so far from being a "Grammar King," write the President's English into all manners of shapes to suit our purposes—to give an opinion of the merits of Mr. Chandler's work, we shall content ourselves with simply calling the attention of our readers to it. One thing, however, we may say—that now the "Grammar King" has "written a book," he may thank his stars if "Tony Penger, (three times a Tony,) and Sweetheart, little dogs and all," don't bark at him.

THE SECRET BAND OF BROTHERS. Compiled from Original Papers, by J. H. Green, the Reformed Gambler. Philadelphia: G. B. Zieber & Co. This is a most extraordinary account of a band of villains who, some years ago, were leagued together to protect and assist each other in their works of darkness. We should deem the statement incredible, did not the account bear upon its very face inherent evidences of its truth. And yet there is nothing incredible in it, nothing but what is consistent with the existence of professional blacklegs and thieves. Whether this organization of villains still continues, is not expressly stated, though the probability is that it does. The manner in which Mr. Green obtained the secret of the constitution of this "Band of Brothers," is minutely given.

GAMBLING UNMASKED OR THE PERSONAL EXPERIENCE OF J. H. GREEN, THE REFORMED GAMBLER. Written by Himself. Philadelphia: G. B. Zieber & Co. This is a most interesting work. It shows how a man of naturally good heart, and whose desire is to do right, may be led, by the injustice of society and the force of circumstances, into vicious practices. The wonder in such a case to Mr Green's is, that he should at length have come out from among his gambling companions and resolved to lead an honest life; and we commend a perusal of his biography as calculated not only to fill the reader with an intense conviction of the evils of gambling, but also to create a spirit of charity towards those who, from the want of proper influences or parental care in early life, have fallen into evil courses.

DICTIONARY OF MODERN GARDENING. By George William Johnson, Esq., author of the Principles of Practical Gardening, &c. With one hundred and eighty wood cuts. Roland, with numerous additions, by David Landreth, of Philadelphia. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard. The author says, in his preface, that he has endeavored to gather together in one volume, attainable at a moderate price, an arranged, easily consulted, record of Gardening, as it is. The American edition has been greatly altered from the original, and adapted to the country. It is now put forth as an Encyclopædia of Gardening, if not of Rural Affairs, so condensed as to be within reach of most persons whom these subjects interest.

GULLIVER'S TRAVELS. New York: Leavitt, Trow & Co. It is many a long day since we read the marvellous travels of Lemuel Gulliver among the Lilliputians and Brobdingnagians—and then we were too young to see the satire, but gave it the same credence as we would to a fairy tale. Since that time we have travelled ourselves among various tribes of Lilliputians, and have seen occasionally a stray Brobdingnagian. The present edition of this admirable work contains copious notes, explanatory of the satire, and is embellished with numerous wood cuts. It also contains a life of the author, Dean Swift, by the Rev. John Mitford. It is for sale by Thomas, Cowperthwaite & Co., of this city.

HEALTH MADE EASY FOR THE PEOPLE. By the Author of Education; as it is, ought to be, and might be, &c. First American Edition. Philadelphia: G. B. Zieber & Co. From the slight glance, which is all we have been able to give this book, we judge very favorably of its contents. The author inculcates the duty, among other things, of frequent ablutions, and seems to thoroughly understand the various subjects upon which he treats. There is a catechism at the close of the volume, which renders it well calculated for a school book.

EUREKA, OR THE JOURNAL OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF INVENTORS. G. W. Adriance has received the May number of this periodical. It contains, among other interesting articles, the Report of the Commissioner of Patents for 1846. Price one dollar per annum.

LONDON WORLD OF FASHION. Godey's reprint for May is before us, with its usual number of plates, &c.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE. We are indebted to Zieber & Co., for No. 105 of the Age.

THE ARMY AND MEXICANS OR GUERRILLAS. By J. H. Green. Second edition, improved. Philadelphia: G. B. Zieber & Co. This work contains illustration after illustration, drawn from Mr. Green's personal experience, of the vice and misery that result from the practice of gambling. It also reveals many of the tricks to which gamblers resort, and proves that it is folly to expect fair play in play. Any man who, after reading this book, still persists in the practice of cards, must be due for such his reward.

GREENOUGH'S PANORAMIC MAGAZINE. The May number of this excellent publication has first two chapters of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, in Phonetic characters. Mr. Greenough also quotes examples of the English of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the readings of which, he assures us, are nearer the Phonetic standard of the English of the present day—which seems to us a very good argument in favor of the Phonetic system.

THE FARMERS' LIBRARY. We have received from Messrs. Zieber & Co., the May number of this excellent agricultural periodical. It is embellished with two plates of some of the cheapest looking individuals we ever saw. We notice, in turning over the pages, articles upon "Roaring Cattle on Turnips," "Drenching and Blistering Sheep," "Sheep Husbandry in the South," &c., &c.

THE VICTIM OF INTEMPERANCE. A Tale of Barr's Conspiracy. By James W. Taylor. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson. The author says in his preface, that this story has grown out of a desire to vindicate the character of John Smith, the first Senator from Ohio, from the imputation of being implicated in the unlawful designs of Aaron Burr, during the years 1806-7

NATIONAL MEDICAL CONVENTION.

The Second Annual Convention of the above named body was recently held in this city. A great deal of business of various kinds was transacted, which it is scarcely necessary to lay before our readers; as it more particularly interests the profession, who will doubtless find the proceedings regularly reported in the Medical Journals. Perhaps the most important of the doings of the Convention, was the organization of a Society, under the name of "The American Medical Association," of which the following gentlemen were elected officers —

Dr. Nathaniel Chapman, of Pennsylvania, President.

Dr. J. Knight, of New Haven; A. H. Stevens, of New York; Dr. Moultrie, of South Carolina; Dr. Rochanan, of Tennessee, Vice Presidents.

Drs. Stille, of Philadelphia, and Dunbar, of Philadelphia, Secretaries.

Dr. J. Hays, of Philada., Treasurer.

Two thousand copies of the proceedings of the Convention and Association were ordered to be printed, and the Association then adjourned to meet again in May, 1848, in Baltimore.

GEN. THOMAS THUMB.

His littleness, General Thomas Thumb, familiarly called Tom Thumb, has arrived in this city, and is prepared to receive his numerous admirers in the Museum Building, in Ninth below Chesnut street. He holds three levees in the course of each day and evening, at which he gives an account of his travels in foreign parts, and goes through his various wonderful performances. Although General Thumb has enjoyed admirable health during his absence from this country, he still is as little as ever. The immoderate kisses he daily received, having had the effect to prevent an increase in bulk—for only danger being, especially in London and Paris, that he would be kissed all away. This also accounts for his continuing to be, as all the ladies aver, such a sweet little fellow. This will be the last opportunity to see the General, as he is resolutely bent upon retiring before many months, to private life—unless some of his devoted friends should insist upon running him for the Presidency; in which case, he thinks, that being so very small, he could hardly fail of going in.

A TRACT DISTRIBUTOR.

A man by the name of Samuel Lewis, was bound over on last Saturday by Judge Kelly, for annoying the congregation that worship at the Callowhill street Universalist Church, by thrusting tracts "into their faces." The testimony proved that the defendant had repeatedly been at the above place distributing tracts, and upon several occasions, held discussions on religious subjects with persons who collected about him. The conduct of the defendant, however, had always been peaceable, and there was no doubt, from the evidence, that he acted under an improper zeal. Judge Kelly said that the defendant seemed to have forgotten that every man had a constitutional right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and was disposed to deny that right to those who differed with him in his particular tenets of faith. He was required to enter bail to the amount of $300 for his future good behaviour.

DINNER TO COM. CONNER.

A public dinner was given, on Thursday of last week, in this city, to Commodore Conner. Over one hundred gentlemen were present on the occasion.

Joseph R. Ingersoll presided, assisted by T. M. Pettit and J. M. Read as Vice Presidents. Among the guests present, were Vice President Dallas, Commodores Stewart and Morgan, Mayor Swift, C. J. Ingersoll, Captain Engels of the Princeton, and several other officers of the Army and Navy.

The usual quantity of victuals was eaten upon the occasion, the usual number of toasts drank, and rather an unusual number of songs sung, after which the company dispersed.

DEATH OF DR. MCCLELLAN.

Doctor George McClellan, one of the most distinguished physicians of this city, and probably the most distinguished surgeon in the United States died very suddenly on Saturday night last. On the morning of that day he is represented as having been in the enjoyment of his usual health and high spirits, but in the afternoon he was attacked by a bilious colic, of which he died in the course of the night. The loss of one so gifted in his profession, is a public calamity.

BEARD OF HEALTH.—The number of deaths during the last week in this city were 190—53 adults and 68 children.

General News.

EXPERIMENT AT POTTSVILLE WITH GUN COTTON.—The result of a series of experiments in mining with gun cotton, is published in the Pottsville papers. No smoke or vitiation of the atmosphere was perceived after any of the experiments, except that which resulted from the repulse used for communicating the fire to the charge. The equivalent of powder would have completely filled the tunnel with smoke. Another important quality of the cotton is, that it can be charged into side and upper holes, without the necessity of a covering to enclose it. Two ounces of cotton, equivalent to about twenty ounces of such powder as is used for blasting can be made into a cartridge six inches in length, and 1¼ inches in diameter. While with the same diameter, the powder would occupy about two feet; thus an important economy may be gained by using smaller drills, both in the cost of the instrument, and the time necessary to make the holes to tamp the charge.

TRADE OF THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY WITH THE NORTH.—The New Orleans Commercial Review, in a late number, has an article exhibiting the movements of the North to draw off the trade of the Valley of the Mississippi from the South, in which it is stated, according to estimates, that within the last ten years the exports of the State of Ohio, by way of the Erie Canal, have increased in the following ratio—Flour, 800 per cent; wheat, 1,300 do; barrels of provisions, 1,000, do.; pearl and pot ashes, 800 do.; wool, 2,000, do; staves, 4,000, do. Receipts of flour at New Orleans during 1845 were 533,312 bbls; receipts at Buffalo, by the Erie Canal, for the same year, 717,460 bbls. Of wheat, receipts at New Orleans were 128,528 bushels; at Buffalo, 7,354,990 bushels—an immense difference, thus showing that the enterprise of the North has already diverted from the great emporium of the South much of that trade which doubtless it would otherwise have enjoyed.

ARMY LIFE.—The Army correspondent of the North American says—

The harsh treatment and privations that the men are subjected to soon make one callous to all but his own feelings and interests. I daily witness painful spectacles of human degradation and selfishness that seemed impossible to our nature. Men we have known at home as generous to prodigality, become, here the most narrow-minded, sordid, hoggish (if you will allow the word) creatures imaginable; yet, vice versa, some who were accounted of no great moment at home, turn up bright sides and astonish us as much by their liberality as do others by their cupidity.

MONS SPECIE COMING.—Two immense sums of money have been devised in England to persons in this country. The first is the famous Townley estate, in the division of which, it is believed, that the family of the Lawrences in New York, will alone probably obtain over $20,000,000. The other is a wind-fall, amounting to $20,000,000, which is said to be inherited by a gentleman in New Castle, Me., of the name of Jennings.

A HINT TO VOLUNTEERS.—One who has seen the "elephant" in Mexico, writes that it is much pleasanter and safer to volunteer in the dragoons than in any other division of the army. It costs Uncle Sam a considerable amount for a horse, and the commanding officers are extremely careful in exposing the riders to unnecessary danger.

KIDD'S TREASURE.—The story about the finding of Kidd's treasure, at Caldwell's Landing, proves untrue. There is one consolation for the poor fellows, however; it don't prove that the treasure is not there.—Lynn News.

WHITEWASH.—It is said that a pint of varnish mixed with a bucket of whitewash, will give it to a great degree, the qualities of paint, and it will withstand all kinds of weather.

ARRIVAL OF THE CALEDONIA.

RISE IN THE PRICES OF ALL KINDS OF GRAIN AND PROVISIONS.

The Caledonia brings fourteen days later intelligence from Europe.

A heavy business had been transacted since the sailing of the last steamship, and the depression in wheat, flour, and Indian corn had given way to buoyancy and activity.

On the 12th ult. wheat advanced from two to three shillings per quarter, and flour met with excellent demand at full rates. Indian corn was quiet, but steady in value. A further advance of one shilling to a quarter, in Wheat, took place on the 14th ult.

Indian Corn is in demand, but the supplies are almost exhausted. Of American Flour, the diminution of the stock is so considerable that the prices of the best brands are full one shilling per barrel above the prices of the 12th.

April 19th, the market was the scene of much agitation, and nearly all that was on sale was eagerly taken on French and Belgian accounts, at a rise of prices equal to six shillings per quarter over those of that day week.

The cotton market is also improved.

Letters from Alexandria announce that, on the 22d ult., upward of forty vessels, laden with corn, left that port, mostly for England.

The import duty imposed upon rice by the states of the Zollverein, has been abolished, in consideration of the present high price of provisions.

The application of coal tar, which has in some places been used as a remedy for the potato blight, is said to have frequently destroyed the vegetative power of the seed.

An officer in the Indian army is said to have partly succeeded in granulating gun cotton, so as to produce a species of white gunpowder.

The Augsburg Gazette states that a chemist of Vienna has produced bread from oil-cake—the refuse of the Colza seed, after extracting the oil—which is both agreeable and nutritive, and costs only a half-penny per pound.

The Saxon government has determined that corn, flour, and potae, from foreign countries, passing in transit on the Elbe to Saxony, shall be admitted, till the end of September, free from duty.

The condition of the manufacturers in Vienna is deplorable. Most of the cotton spinners work at a loss, and have been obliged to diminish the number of their hands. The unemployed spinners are now about fifteen hundred in number. They have neither bread nor work.

In Germany, and particularly in Silesia, the crops bear an appearance so promising, that the markets of the country already begin to feel the effect by a sensible reduction in prices.

The Austrian Government is establishing agricultural schools in all parts of the empire.

Lieutenant Moriarty, R. N., has been appointed emigration agent for the port of Baltimore.

The lady of Minister Bancroft had the honor of dining with the Queen at Buckingham palace on the 15th ult.

The West India Royal Mail Steam-packet Company have purchased the Great Western for £25,000.

Mr. Ronge was undergoing a month's imprisonment at Breslau for preaching without permission of the authorities.

A good deal of discussion and correspondence has appeared in the papers since the sailing of the Cambria, respecting Mr. Frederick Douglass, an anti-slavery lecturer who went out passenger in that vessel.

The state of affairs in Ireland is improving. Matters have reached their worst, and are now mending. The last accounts of Mr. O'Connell's health are very unsatisfactory.

The condition of the Bank of England excites some attention, and among commercial men no little degree of alarm. The bullion is rapidly disappearing, and to keep it at home the rate of interest is raised to counteract foreign exchanges.

There is an inspired feeling in the manufacturing districts. At Manchester a better inquiry has sprung up for goods and yarn, and a fair business would be done if spinners and manufacturers would moderate their expectations as to prices.

The proceedings of Parliament since the sailing of the last steamer possess but little interest. The business will be wound up as speedily as possible, in order to prepare for its dissolution, which is to follow in June or July next. Perhaps the history of England does not present a time when less party feeling prevailed.

Affairs in Portugal are approaching the climax. The tedious, unsatisfactory struggle between the insurgents and the Queen's troops, is drawing to a close. The Queen's troops seem unable to meet the emergency, and the protection of Great Britain has been solicited. Fears have been entertained that the person of the Queen is not safe in the Capital. A rising is anticipated.

The Prussian General Diet was opened by a speech from the King at Berlin on the 11th. The King made an extraordinary speech, and as lengthy as it was novel.

The French Government, in imitation of that of England, has forbidden French citizens from accepting letters of marque, which Mexico has distributed with profusion in English, French and Spanish harbors.

The suttee has been abolished in the Nizam's dominions; being the second instance of this progressive improvement in a native Indian state.

The Indian Government has resolved, at the request of the Council of Education of Bengal, to found a University at Calcutta, on the model of the University of London.

Some tea which has lately been grown in the Indian district of Kumaon, is said to be fully equal in quality to the finest Chinese teas; and its cultivation is expected to prove profitable.

THE JANESVILLE.—Our readers will be gratified to learn that the United States ship Jamestown, laden with provisions for the relief of the Irish, and commanded by Robert B. Forbes, arrived safely at Cork, from Boston, after a prosperous and splendid passage of fifteen days! The papers speak of this event as "one of the proudest in American history, which speaks trumpet-tongued for the national benevolence, and is probably the noblest charity on record." The following particulars are given:

Her arrival called forth the liveliest sensations of joy and gratitude, and thousands flocked to see the noble ship.

A meeting of the Cork District Railway Committee was held on the 13th, when a requisition was promptly prepared, calling on the mayor to summon a meeting of the citizens, to devise the best means of welcoming and acknowledging the gift. The bells of Shandon, and of the Cathedral were joyfully rung, and the Cove was splendidly illuminated on the evening of the 14th.

A deputation of the gentry of Cork, headed by Dr. Millett, J. P., visited the ship on the 13th, and presented Capt Forbes with an address, to which he replied in suitable and touching terms. After some conversation the deputation withdrew, having previously invited Capt. Forbes and officers to a public dinner on the 15th, at Cove, which the gallant gentlemen accepted. The dinner was a very splendid affair, and attended by the most influential classes in and around Cove. Capt. Forbes was the hero of the day, and acquitted himself in an admirable manner. On the 16th, a public meeting was held at the County Court House, Cork, for the purpose of returning thanks to Capt. Forbes and his patriotic crew, for the sympathy they had shown towards the suffering population of Ireland.

The European Times makes the following remarks —

"The grateful hearts of the Irish people are elated at the noble and generous conduct of Congress in sending them a large quantity of food free of expense, and what enhances the obligation the more is the fact that the gratuity has been sent in an American frigate. This event has excited a feeling in Cork, the Southern metropolis of Ireland, greater than words can describe. The people are in ecstacies. Nothing, certainly, so far as a pecuniary offering goes, could produce a feeling towards America more than this humble recognition of their sufferings. In the hour of distress, people are susceptibly alive to the sympathy of others. Nations, like individuals, can best appreciate those who show kind and generous feelings when it is most needed. Taken in this sense, the consideration of the Americans will not be without its fruit; and if circumstances should ever arive when it may be necessary to throw oil on the troubled waters of international hostility, the circumstances to which we refer, must, in the nature of things, possess a God like influence."

THE COTTON MARKET FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 16.

In consequence of later accounts from the United States in the earlier part of the week, which will indicate estimates of the crop, there was an improved demand from the trade as well as from speculators, at an advance of ⅛d to ¼d. per pound upon American descriptions.

The Boston steamer arrived yesterday, and the information she brought of the great and sudden falling off in the receipts at the ports, as compared with the last year, produced a very animated demand, and the market closed with firmness at an advance upon last week's quotations, of ⅛ a ¼ pence per pound upon American, and ⅛ a ⅜ pence upon all others.

Speculators have taken 20,000 American, 1,000 Egyptian, and 3,790 Surat and for export 1,650 American, 250 Pernambuco, 50 Maranham, and 170 Surat. The sales of the week are 60,130 bales.

Report for April 17th and 19th—The demand for cotton has been more moderate since the 16th. The sales do not exceed 7,000 to 8,000 bales; prices are receding, and the market has a quiet appearance. Yesterday the sales reported included 3,000 American at 6¾d. to 7¼d.; 100 Pernambuco at 8d.; 100 Egyptian at 7¼d. to 8¼d. We may further observe the decline is fully 1d. since report.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

A meeting for the formation of an American Evangelical Alliance, was held in New York on Wednesday week, Chief Justice Hornblower presiding. After a full discussion, the meeting adopted a series of five resolutions, in addition to the views put forth by the London Convention. The following are the principal resolutions:—

1. That in accordance with the first and second of the Evangelical principles of the basis, it is the right of every individual man, throughout the world, to possess the word of God, as revealed in the Holy Scriptures, and obey that word for himself, under his responsibility to God, who has given him that revelation to be a lamp to his feet and a light to his path.

5. Inasmuch as the peculiar circumstances of this country seem to demand an expression of sentiment on the subject of slavery, this alliance declares that discrimination is to be made between those who hold Slaves, not by their own fault, or for the sake of their own advantage, but from motives entirely benevolent, and those who hold their fellow creatures in bondage for the sake of gain, and that the former are to be regarded as entitled to fellowship, while the latter cannot be received as members of this Alliance.

Still the one object of the Alliance shall be steadily kept in view, which is not the promotion of temperance nor the removal of slavery or any other specific evil, however desirable these objects may be in themselves, but the promotion of Christian union and brotherly love.

Political Intelligence

ELECTION IN LOUISVILLE, KY.—The Whigs have carried the city of Louisville by a majority of several hundreds. Upon the License question the vote was 678 for "License," and 1,095 for "No License." On the question of a subscription by the city, to the stock of the Lexington and Louisville Railroad Company, the vote was 1,489 yeas to 308 nays.

STATE OF IOWA.—The Democrats have carried their candidates in every judicial district:—1st district, Williams's majority, 351; 2d do., Grant's majority, 448; 3d do., Olney's majority, 79; 4th do., Carlton's majority, 561. Total Democratic majority, 1,432. But Mason, Democrat, has been detested as superintendent, by Harlan, Whig, by about 430.

ELECTION IN WILMINGTON, DEL.—The Democrats in three Wards elected all their candidates; in the Fourth Ward the Whigs elected theirs. The Democratic majority on an average is over 60.

VIRGINIA ELECTION.—The election of Irvin, Whig, has been decided by the official returns. His majority is four. McMullen, Democrat, is elected by a majority of one.

ANTITHESIS.

BY MRS. M. T. W. CHANDLER

When thou, dear child, wrapt in unconscious sleep,
Within my circling arms thy form didst lay,
From troubled rest I oft would start and weep,
And dream some power had borne thee far away.
Pale with affright, and trembling with my fears,
I wake—to find thy head still on my breast—
And with a gush of warm and grateful tears,
I bade the visionary dread depart.

But now, when sinking to my lonely nest,
Breeding o'er mem'ries of thine infant charms,
In my false dreams, I hill thee on my breast,
And fold thee, soft and warm, within mine arms,
Who, then, shall tell the anguish of my soul,
When the chill morning counsels—bleak and lone—
When the sun rises, I shall not wake to see
Each vanished, and I wake—to find thee gone!

DIFFERENT LANGUAGES.—A German, Gatthow, says of the German language, "it is far too abstract for ordinary purposes. It expresses nothing right out, is full of paraphrases, and is far too much a curial language to be all the orator requires." The English tongue he holds to be "as natural as passion itself;" French "the language of conversation, of mutual understanding, and amiable persuasion."

COST OF A WIFE'S HOOPS.—One Mr. Jones, in Queen's County New York, has recovered $5,000 damages of George W. Houston, for an improper intimacy with the former's wife. Mrs. Jones, it will be recollected, eloped from Hempstead last Summer. Mrs. Flower eloped at the same time and in the same company with Mr. Houston. If Jones gets five thousand, what will Flower get?

VEGETATION.—We hear very sad accounts of the vegetation. The unfavorable weather has retarded the growth of the wheat and grasses so much, that fears are entertained of unproductive crops. Even the red clover, which has a deep root, and generally forces its way up, is stationary. We need rain, and gentler and more agreeable weather.—U. S. Gazette.

RELIEF OF SCOTLAND.—The Scottish Relief Committee, in Pittsburg, have been laboring effectively, and, as a part of their labors, remitted to this city, on Friday week, $2,100 and fifty barrels of flour. The flour is carried free of charge by Messrs. Graff & Co. The Committee has other contributions to send forward.

ESSAY UPON THE WAR.—Some witty genius has taken up the offer of the Peace Society for the best essay upon the origin and result of the Mexican war, and sends the following

MISSOURI SHARP SHOOTING.—The cause of the little loss of our troops at Sacramento is said to be the fear of the Mexicans to put their heads above the parapets. They had such dread of Missouri sharp shooting, that they supposed death would follow any exposure of the person above their entrenchments. Consequently all their pieces were aimed too high.

SPARROW OBSERVER.—It is said that on the plate which was deposited in the corner stone of the Smithsonian Institution, the name of the founder, James Smithson, is not inscribed, though those of the Regents, the President, and other officers of the general and city governments are! If this be true, it is a strange omission.

BRITISH DESERTERS.—The Canada papers are loud in their complaint of great numbers of British troops deserting their flag and fleeing to the United States to enlist in our army. It is estimated that not less than four hundred have taken "French leave" of their posts.

THE EXPRESS BUSINESS.—Running expresses through Mexico is no easy or pleasant business. Mr. Charles M. Bogbus, who ran an express from Plan del Rio to Vera Cruz, for the Picayune, with the news of the recent battle, was repeatedly shot at from the wayside.

EXTRAORDINARY MODE OF PRESERVING THE BODY OF A CHILD.—A child lately died on board one of our emigrant ships, and rather than throw it into the deep, the mother salted down the child in her trunk, and brought it into New York in a state of preservation.

PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.—The three companies of Pennsylvania volunteers which were detained at Lobos on account of the small pen, have arrived at Vera Cruz. No deaths had occurred, and the men were quite well, the small pox having disappeared.

SNOW AND ICE.—A letter from Montreal, dated April 19, says:—"The hills of ice in the St. Lawrence have at this moment a magnificent appearance. It is astonishing to see the immense piles which now cover the river in front of the city. The weather continues very cold, and the snow is in many places two feet in depth."

GOOSEBERRIES.—A French nurseryman says that exhausted tan bark spread on the surface round the roots of gooseberry bushes, is an effectual remedy for caterpillars. A cart load of the bark is amply sufficient for the largest garden.

SINGULAR ACCIDENTS.—A young man named Charles Fuller, met his death in a novel and painful manner last Friday week, at Mount Ida, Me. He was in the woods, and while standing in the snow, it gave way, letting him down upon the stub of a branch, that had been cut about two feet above the ground, which entered his abdomen, and so injured him that he died the next Monday morning.

A singular and serious accident also occurred last week at Cincinnati. In company with a gentleman in a buggy, a young lady was returning to the city from a country jaunt. Her long dress, flying over the side of the vehicle, caught in the splinters of a broken fellow of the hind wheel, and dragged her violently and suddenly out upon the pavement. In the fall her skull was fractured, and her recovery is doubtful.

NEVER DESPAIR, YOU CAN BE CURED.

PHILADELPHIA, July 26, 1846.

TO THE PUBLIC:—I certify that before my remembrance I became afflicted with what the physicians called SCROFULA. It made its appearance by pain and swelling of the joints—more especially of my ankles, knees, wrists and elbows; after which the glands of my throat and neck become inflamed and swelled, attended with most excruciating pains. I was often confined entirely to my bed and for weeks together could not move my neck or turn my head. Several physicians attended me at different times—but they did not appear to do me any good.

About a year ago I was attacked with vomiting, which continued for about twenty minutes all one night. The next day an eruption appeared on the sides of my neck, which soon spread all over my neck, head and face, with intolerable itching of my eyes and eyelids, which soon closed my eye-lashes and caused the hair to fall from off my head, and soon the disease spread all over me; my limbs were one entire scab. I could not bend my hands or arms without causing the skin to crack open, when the blood would run out. Some of my finger nails came off. In short, I was a mass of sores, and despaired of life, in this condition called upon Doctor JAYNE, in order that he might undertake my case. He directed me to take his ALTERATIVE three times a day; and his SANATIVE PILLS as often as I should find it necessary. I have now taken his ALTERATIVE four months, and am most happy to say that I feel entirely recovered.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.

This medicine has been for years gaining almost incredible cures of diseases arising from impurities of the blood. The unfortunate victim of hereditary disease, with swollen glands, enlarged joints and bones half carious, has been restored to health and vigor. The scrofulous patient, covered with sileers, loathsome to himself and to his attendants, has been made whole. Hundreds of persons, who had groaned hopelessly for years under enormous and glandular disorders, chronic rheumatisms, and many other complaints originating in a vitiated state of the secretive organs and the circulation, have been raised as it were from the rack of disease, and now, with regenerated constitutions, gratefully testify to the efficacy of this inestimable preparation. The testimony of those who have been cured by its use, with their residence, has been published in pamphlet form, and may be had if desirable, a mass of the most overwhelming testimony would be brought forward proving most conclusively its superiority.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 160 Fulton street, New York.

Sold also by ANDREW & DICKSON, corner of Fifth and Spruce streets, Philadelphia, and by Druggists generally throughout the United States.

Price $1 per bottle. Six bottles for five dollars.

TAYLOR.—The mere mention of this name is enough to awaken emotions of patriotism in every breast. GEN. TAYLOR, certainly is very popular, but there is another TAYLOR, quite as popular. The one cuts the throats of our enemies, the other cuts the coats for our friends. The one has won his way to fame by the sword, the other has cut his name upon the highest pinnacle of FAME by his SHEARS. GENERAL TAYLOR, of Kentucky, has defeated all who opposed his march in Mexico, and F. MAHAN, TAILOR, of No. 211 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, author of the celebrated System of Garment Cutting has driven from the field all his competitors, and, like his warrior friend, finds the path to FAME and wealth unobstructed.—The Camden Democrat, "*N. The Markets.

PHILADELPHIA MARKETS.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, May 8, 1847.

FLOUR AND MEAL.—The limited stocks on hand and the fact that most of the receipts were taken on arrival to fill up various contracts, caused holders of superfine Flour to be very firm in their demands, and several thousand barrels changed hands since our last weekly review at $7 for good brands, and $6,62½a6,75 for Western for future delivery. On the promulgation of the steamer's intelligence yesterday, the market became unsettled, and to-day holders ask an advance of 25a37½c on our quotations, but we hear of no sales. Rye Flour has been sold at $4,75a4,87½ per bbl. Corn Meal was in some demand early in the week, and sales to some extent were made at $4,50 per bbl for Pennsylvania; but the greatly reduced stocks, in connection with the European advices received to-day, have induced holders to ask a further advance.

GRAIN.—Wheat continues in good demand, and the receipts have been readily disposed of on arrival at $1,25a1,28 for fair to good Pennsylvania reds, $1,37a1,38 for mixed, and $1,40a1,42 for white, partly for shipment. To-day prices are nearly higher. Rye has sold at 67½a68c. Corn has been in demand, and large sales of yellow were made at 54a55c early in the week, and consequently at 55a57c. To day $1 per bushel has been offered and refused for a cargo of Corn. Oats have sold freely at our last quotations.

BARK.—The supplies of Quercitron are very light, and prices continue firm. Sales of 50 hhds No. 1 at $35 per ton.

BEESWAX.—We note a sale of 1600 lbs good yellow at 27½c.

CANDLES.—Sperm continues steady at 31a32c, with small sales.

COAL.—The supplies are on the increase, but with a fair demand. Prices of Anthracite are well supported. We continue to quote Schuylkill White Ash at $5,62½; do Red Ash $5,64a5,75 for lump and 25 cts higher for broken and screened. Lehigh sells at $5,87½a4 per ton for lump.

COFFEE—The principal operations have been by way of sample. Rio having been disposed of at 6½a7½ cts. By private contracts about 1200 bags have been sold at 7½a7½ cts for Rio and Laguayra, on the usual credit.

COTTON—The activity noted in our last review has continued during the present week, with an upward tendency in prices, which was further increased by the partial advices from Europe. To day, however, there has been but little doing, dealers generally awaiting their letters by the steamer. Week's sales over 800 bales, as our quotations—

	New Orleans.	Upland.
Middling,	10½a11¼	11 a11¼
" Fair,	11½a12½	12½a13
Good Fair,	12½a13½	13½a13½

COPPER—Sheathing is held firmly at 22½ cents 6 months.

DOMESTIC GOODS—We hear no new feature to notice in the market this week.

FEATHERS—Are in fair request, at full rates. Sales of 7000 lbs Western at 32a33 cents, for good to prime quality.

FISH—Prices are steady. Sales Mackerel from vessels and store, at $11a11,75 for No. 1; $7a7,75 for No. 2, and $5a5,75 for No. 3 per bbl.

FRUIT—We note sales of 500 boxes Sicily Oranges at $3a2,50, and 800 do Lemons at $4a3,75 per box. By auction, sales of 3000 boxes Sicily Oranges at $1,90a2,14½, as to condition, with some in very poor order at 75c; 1700 do Lemons at $1,25a1,87½ per box, cash and 4 mos. Dried Apples have been in request, with sales to some extent, at $1 per bushel.

HEMP—A sale of Hackled on terms not made public, is the only operation of which we are advised this week. The market is very poorly supplied.

HIDES—No operations have occurred since our last weekly review.

IRON—Continues in demand, and about 1000 tons have changed hands this week, at $40a37 for Anthracite, and $32a31 for Charcoal Iron.

OILS—Linseed has sold this week at prices ruling from 70 to 75c. Sperm is taken only in small lots, at former rates. Whale is in fair demand, at 32a32c.

LEAD—The market is quiet, without change in prices.

LUMBER—The supplies are on the increase, with a fair demand at former rates.

Stayed from the Schuylkill region to

May 1,	694,077 feet.
Previously,	3,324,863
Total,	3,919,930

MOLASSES—The market has been quiet. Sales of 130 hhds Cienfuegos at 28c; 50 Matanzas at 24, and some Porto Rico and New Orleans 27½—4 mos.

NAVAL STORES—We note a sale of Tar at $2,25 per bbl. Rosin—Several parcels have changed hands at 75c for common to arrive, and $1 for No. 2 on the wharf. Spirits of Turpentine—Sales at 40a41c.

PLASTER—Continues dull. Last sale at $3 per ton.

RICE—Has been in demand, and prices tend upward. Nearly all in market was sold at 4½a4½.

SALT—No sales have occurred this week.

SEEDS—Cloverseed continues dull, and prices are barely supported. Flaxseed is coarse, and sells readily at $1,56a1,62½ per bushel.

SPIRITS—In Brandy, Gin and Rum, the sales have been limited at former prices. Whiskey has sold at 25a26c, in hhds and bbls.

TALLOW—Stocks very light, and prices firm at 8a9c, with small sales.

TEAS—The demand is less active, though sales to a fair extent have been made at full rates.

TOBACCO—We note sales of 60 hhds Kentucky at 4 a5½c on time.

WOOL—We have nothing to add to our remarks of last week in the report of this article.

EXCHANGES—Sterling Bills are held at 6½a7 per cent. prem and dull. France (5,32½a5,35.

FREIGHTS—The large number of vessels in port, and the scarcity of produce at this time, has caused a further decline in the rates to Europe, which we now quote at 3c 6bds for Flour, and 15cbbl for Grain.—Bull. Reporter.

LINES WRITTEN TWENTY YEARS AFTER MARRIAGE.

FROM THE HUNTINGDONIAN.

Dear wife, some twenty years have flown
Since you and I agreed to marry;
Then you were rather young, I own,
But then I was too old to tarry:
In single state full long enough
I'd lived, and wished to try the double;
Probably I'd found but meagre stuff,
And Fame an evanescent bubble.

Fame leads no more a solace cause,
To soothe me in my lonesome times;
And writing poem seemed very tame,
And still more stupid stringing rhymes:
The drama I pronounced a bore,
I cared not for a minor pension,
Or plain and characters of yore,
When solemn nonsense was in fashion.

There was a emptiness in my heart,
A sort of strange and constant longing;
And through my brain what thoughts would dart,
How many shapes go wildly thronging!
My feelings that were like a feather,
Became so heavy, sad, peculiar;
At first I guessed it was the weather,
And then my sweet sweet-heart, Julia.

But when the female grew quite warm,
And quite as warmly smiled the latter,
I found that neither sun nor storm
Nor gentle Julia was the matter;
"Who was it then?" I madly cried,
"It must be some such charming fairy;
A lovelier one," my soul replied,
"Dulcinea, dear, enchanting Mary."

At first you doubted, then refused
To listen to my sudden wooing;
But when you paused and why mused,
Upon your chorus and my suddenly,
Your tender bosom relenting knew
Something of Love's sublime emotion,
And finally rapsid the true
Deep fervor of my soul's devotion.

Sweet wife! did I not tell you much
That we should always love each other,
That I would always be in truth
Your more than husband, father, brother?
Ah! what have you not been to me!
My hope, my joy, my pride, my treasure,
Since twenty years have flown with thee,
Like dreams of pure unruffled pleasure.

Interesting Sketch.

THE NEW POPE.

FROM FANNY KEMBLE BUTLER'S NEW WORK.

We have been favored with some of the early sheets of "A Year of Consolation," by this lady, and present our readers with some attractive gleanings. The "Year" was spent in Italy, and her residence in Rome afforded her an opportunity of picking up some interesting anecdotes of the new Pope; who has "Won golden opinions from all sorts of people."

"Monsignor ——" says the enthusiasm of the people for their new sovereign, is not to be described. Immediately after the amnesty, the men who had recovered their liberty flocked to the churches and received the sacrament, without exception, with extreme devotion. Moreover, he added that Heaven had certainly appointed this man to the exigency of the times, for that the whole papal government was tottering to its foundations. If anything can save it, as a government, I suppose this may; but it is far more likely to prove the preparatory process for entire change; and in this respect most fitly may the present Pope be considered God's messenger, and the appointed instrument of the appointed time. Monsignor —— told us several admirable anecdotes of his benevolence and activity. The day of the procession of St. John Lateran, a poor old beggar woman, stretched by the wayside, called out to Christ's successor upon earth for help, 'Santo Padre, ajutatemi che sto qui perisco vecchia abbandonata senza la paglia e manjo di fame.' The Pope sent her immediately a gold piece, and passed on in the procession. At night, in the dress of an Abbate, having perfectly remembered the house indicated to him as that where the woman lived, he went to seek her, and found her absolutely lying upon straw, and in a state of miserable destitution. He immediately proceeded to the house of the curate of the parish; the latter, called up not without considerable demur and difficulty (not knowing from whom the summons came,) from his comfortable bed, was lost in amazement and dismay at the sight of the Pope, who, reprimanding him severely for his neglect of the poor under his charge, bade him send immediately money, food, bed and bedding, to the poor old beggar, whom he had just visited. His Holiness, it seems, has a box at the post-office, of which he himself keeps the key; and whereas no letter whatever was ever allowed to reach the late Gregory the Sixteenth, it is an understood thing that this box, with everything put into it, is delivered immediately into the Pope's hands. A certain sum of money having been charitably appropriated, I do not precisely remember by whom now, in dower-money, for a certain number of poor young Roman girls in one of the parishes in Rome, one among the number, a poor deformed girl, was defrauded by the priest in whose hands the money was lodged, and who retained here. The girl ventured herself to address a letter to the Pope, stating how her portion had been withheld from her. Without loss of time the defaulter was summoned and condemned by the Pope to pay the poor crippled girl fifty scudi out of his own pocket, besides the twenty-five which was the portion due to her. Some evening after this, in his usual inexplicable dress of an Abbate, he knocked at the door of an asylum for poor children, the management of which was not supposed to be altogether conscientiously conducted. The porter refused to open the door, alleging that the children were at supper, and just going to bed, and that nobody could be let in. At last, the magical 'Aprite che sono il Papa,' threw the door wide, and the porter, in an ecstacy of fright, was running to rouse the whole establishment with the news, which, however, His Holiness forbade; and merely desiring the dismayed superior to conduct him to the children's eating-room, he proceeded to taste the bread and wine set before them for their supper. He then turned to the superior, and said—'To-morrow, sir, let the bread and wine put before these poor children be such as it ought to be; and remember that I have my eye upon you:' with which salutary warning he departed. There is something rather Haroun Alraschid in these nocturnal expeditions of His Holiness. On fixed days in the week, for a certain numbers of hours, he receives indiscriminately all persons who wish to see and speak with him. They are admitted without any distinction, one by one, according to number; and the Pope, permitting them to seat themselves, hears their grievance, receives their petitions, and, warning them that any attempt to impose upon him or in any way alter the truth, will be detected and punished, takes their name and address, and has their business inquired into and put to rights. As for the women, said Monsignor, they perfectly adore him, for nothing can exceed his graciousness and kindness to them:—'e davero,' added he, with Christianly humanity, 'bisogna pensarlo che sono poveratte anche lei creature di Dio!' for which allowance we heretical females were duly grateful."

* * * * * *

Among many others, —— told us two beautiful anecdotes of his humanity and wisdom. While he was Archbishop of Spoleto, a list of persons suspected of political liberalism was brought to him, and he was earnestly recommended to forward it to Rome as an exhibition of zeal that would be highly serviceable to himself: he said he would take care of it, and immediately tore it up, and threw it into the fire. Since the proclamation of his act of amnesty, a subscription was set on foot in Rome to raise a sum of money for the poor man whose long detention in the papal prisons had, of course, not cost them back into the world with very full pockets. A list of the subscribers' names was brought to the Pope by the Governor of Rome, Marini, who suggested that it would be very desirable to keep it, as a future means of ascertaining who were tainted with sympathy for liberal opinions. The Pope said he thought it was highly desirable to make that use of it, and immediately wrote down his own name, with a donation of a hundred scudi, and engaged Monsignor Marini to follow his example, and secured himself as a friend of those who had suffered for liberal opinions. There is a touch of humor about this anecdote that makes it perfectly enchanting.

"While Archbishop of Imola, he was already known to have exhibited his sympathy for those suffering in the cause of political reform, by furnishing money of the exiled patriots with money. A beautiful anecdote is related of his merciful and humane disposition while he was in this situation. Among the other duties of the archbishop is that of a periodical survey of the prisons, in the course of which, visits of greater or less length may be paid by him to the cells of each or any of the criminals. An unfortunate woman, whose husband had been condemned for upwards of a year, and who had in vain solicited permission to see him, at length, in despair, applied to the archbishop, whose office, however, gave him no power of furnishing her with the required permission. Much moved, however, by the poor creature's misery, the humane man remembered her petition, and on the occasion of his next official visit to the prison, sent word to her to join the train which usually attended his progress on these occasions. Arrived at the cell where her husband was incarcerated, he bade the woman enter it, and cut himself at the dungeon-door for an hour, during which space of time the unfortunate people enjoyed once more the blessing of being reunited.

FRENCH STATISTICS.

PARIS.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

This is a little world, where all the comfort and luxury which man can enjoy, are found; and where misery has also made her home. It is built on a beautiful valley which is divided by the river Seine. It is in the form of an irregular oval, the greater diameter of which, from east to west, or from the barrier of Passy to that of Charenne, is about two French leagues or six miles; and the lesser, from north to south, from the barrier of the Martyrs to that of La Santé, is about one league and a half, or about five miles and a half.

The Seine is crossed by twenty-six bridges, four of which are suspended; these bind the different parts of the town together. About 1,800 streets, lanes, alleys and passages give to the inhabitants a free circulation. They form a total extent of about 300 miles, the whole of which is well paved, one-eighth of the pavements is renewed yearly during the fine weather. What a quantity of light is nightly consumed! besides the old way of lighting with oil, there are not less than 671,900 gas burners, employed in the public streets or private houses.

To place the houses in one continuous line they would extend about six hundred miles.

The number of houses in Paris exceeds 30,000, and on an average they contain near twenty-six inhabitants each, the whole population is near a million. The average rent of the houses is four hundred dollars and a fraction over. There are about 3,100 houses furnished for the use of travellers and strangers, and they are occupied by a fleating population of from 35 to 40,000 persons, among whom are few old people or children.

Two hundred public establishments adorn the city and add to its comfort and business. Among these are thirty-seven Catholic churches, eight temples, dedicated to the different sects, one bank, one exchange, seven markets, twenty-seven theatres, seven colleges, forty-two caserns or barracks, twenty-seven hospitals and asylums, thirteen prisons, three cemeteries, and five slaughter houses. These last are vast establishments on the outskirts of the city, erected at enormous expense, where all the butchers of Paris are required to kill their cattle, and for which they pay the government a considerable sum, which goes to increase the revenue of the city.

The population of Paris did not exceed 100,000 inhabitants at the commencement of the fourteenth century; at the end of the sixteenth it had only 250,000, and, in the year 1789, only 524,000. Now its population probably exceeds 1,000,000; in 1841, it was 912,033.

The census of 1836 shows the amount of population then to have been 909,126 persons who were classed as follows:

	Males.	Females.	Totals.
Persons not married,	268,933	225,980	492,913
Married,	174,669	172,595	346,972
Widows and widowers,	16,517	53,025	70,129
Totals,	459,559	449,600	909,126

There has been a yearly increase of births in the French capital until now they exceed 30,000 per annum, which is about 82 per day, or 3.41 per hour. The births are equal to one for twenty-seven inhabitants.

It will be perceived that the births exceed the deaths. The latter are a little over 27,000 per annum, or about 3 per hour. The deaths are equal to one for thirty-three inhabitants.

Formerly the number of marriages was much less than at present; they now average over 9,000 a year, about 24 per day, or one per hour.

In the following table will be found the average number of marriages for five years from 1831 to 1835, and the number of marriages in 1840 and 1844, in the following classes.

	Average for 5 years.	A. D., 1840.	A. D., 1844.
Between bachelors and maids,	5,833	7,344	7,772
" Bachelors and widows,	433	461	497
" Widowers and maids,	918	849	974
" Widowers and widows,	284	272	289

There are in Paris about 640 magistrates of different kinds; 1,450 lawyers, attorneys, notaries, &c.; 1,434 physicians; 800 bakers; 400 butchers; and about 1,500 grocers; 800 persons who keep boarding houses, (hotels garnis et logeurs); 900 restaurants; and 2,300 persons who sell wine. About 10,000 drivers of coaches, cabs, stages and omnibuses; 50,000 domestics of whom 13,500 are males, and 25,400 are females. Upwards of 168,000 persons have received charity in one year, of whom 21,000 are foundlings.

About 197,000 persons yearly make deposits in the saving fund, and the aggregate sum in 1843, exceeded $8,000,000, of which was drawn by depositors only $7,100,000.

The revenue of the city is about $14,000,000, the greater part of which is employed to keep it in perfect order, and to add to its numerous embellishments, to the improvement of its streets, gardens, promenades, parks and public buildings.

FROM THE NATIONAL ERA.

THE MOTHER.

BY MISS ALICE CARRY.

A king, whose wisdom much renowned of old,
Brightened his palace like a star of gold,
Sat in his hall of judgment, firm, yet mild,
When thither came two women with a child.

'Tis mine, oh, king!' 'tis mine, the mother cries;
Nay, said the other, thou hast spoken lies!
The child is mine, and in my bosom lay,
When this false woman stole it thence away.

Then, said the king, Let each be remanded;
Bring in the sword; divide the living child!
And she whose child it was not, spake again,
Saying, Righteous judgment! straightway be it slain!

Nay, said the other, all I have I'll give,
To the last farthing, so the child may live!

And the king said, in accent sweetly mild,
This woman is the mother of the child!
So shall it scatheless from the ordeal part,
Rock'd by the beating of her faithful heart.

WOMEN IN LOVE.

An acute female writer, after remarking a little sneeringly what capital diplomatists men are in love matters, and how eager, simple, vain woman is, to believe them all that is generous, disinterested and high-minded, because they can scatter a little gold dust upon the surface of that hollow mine of selfishness within their bosoms—adds the following novel observations

Women, acute and well judging in other subjects, are blind as beetles when a man addresses the language of love to them; a moral mist rises over their understandings—they become credulous as bigots, and the poor man, even if his suit be hopeless, is instantly invested with some sort of merit, by virtue of the tender passion. It is remarkable, too, that in the inverse ratio to other things, experience in these affairs seems not only to avail a woman nothing, but to throw her off her guard. "To refuse twenty good offers and marry an apprentice at thirty," is next to a proverb. Well seasoned hearts, perforated by many an arrow from Love's quiver, have always some weak part in them, and yield, often, in a minute. For my own part, from intimate observation of my own sex—the result of many a friendly confidence in these matters—I would sooner trust the discernment of sixteen on such points than of thirty-six; and whilst it is usual to talk of the dangers of eighteen and the folly of young girls, the moralist who wishes well to womankind should point out the cheats of eight-and-thirty, the extreme rashness of forty-five.

THE QUAKER MEETING.

FROM THE PHILADELPHIA FRIEND, OF TWO FIFTY INSTANT.

The Yearly Meeting closed on 7th-day morning after a session of unusual interest.

The attendance was large, and a number of minutes Friends from other Yearly Meetings were present.

The proceedings on Second-day morning were chiefly confined to the reading of the epistles from London, Dublin, New York, Baltimore, North Carolina, and Indiana Yearly Meetings. No epistle from Ohio was received; and two epistles, both purporting to be from New England, were stated by the clerk to be on the table. In the afternoon the representatives reported the names of the old Clerk and Assistant Clerk, who were re-appointed.

A long discussion ensued on a proposal to read one of the epistles from New England, which resulted in referring the subject to the next Yearly Meeting.

The morning and afternoon of Third-day and part of Fourth-day morning, were occupied in reading the minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings. The unusual length of these minutes was caused by the insertion upon them, of an examination of certain unusual writings of members of our Society, which had long been the cause of much uneasiness, and against which that meeting believed itself called upon to bear its testimony, by contrasting them with the writings of our early Friends. The question of approving of these minutes, and especially of this examination, occasioned a discussion of several hours, and ended in the adoption of the document by the solid judgment of the meeting, which directed its publication by the Meeting for Sufferings. The calmness which covered the assembly after this conclusion was arrived at, was remarkable and comforting to many Friends.

In the afternoon of Fourth-day the reports of the Indian Committee, and of the Boarding School Committee, were read and approved. The former stated that the condition of the Indians in regard to agriculture and the arts, to education and temperance, was perceptibly improving; and encourages the hope that if they can be sustained in their present situation, the civilization of this small remnant of our native tribes will be permanently secured.

The condition of the boarding-school at Westtown was represented as being highly satisfactory. The average number of pupils during the past year was one hundred and sixty-six, and the good order and improvement of the pupils was commended. Considerable improvements have been made, and are now making, to the buildings, in consequence of which the Summer session of the school will not open till the 10th instant.

A memorial concerning our deceased Friend Ellen M'Carty, a minister of Muncy Monthly Meeting, was also read.

Meetings for worship were held at all the houses on Fifth-day morning.

The consideration of the State of society as brought forward by the answers to the Queries, occupied the afternoon of Fifth-day, and much salutary and pertinent counsel was administered on the occasion by many of our experienced Friends.

On the morning of Sixth-day the report of the Committee on Education was read, exhibiting the state of that concern within our limits. As the want of funds to assist Friends in remote situations has prevented the Committee from being of much service in this respect, and as it was feared that Quarterly and Monthly Meetings were somewhat paralyzed in their exertions by the existence of the Committee, which was thus unable to give efficient aid, it was released at its own request.

The reports on the subject of spirituous liquors were next taken up, by which it appears that our testimony against their use as an article of drink is advancing, only forty-eight members being in that habit, or giving it to their workmen. Two of the Quarterly Meetings, and many of the Monthly Meetings, appear to be entirely clear of it.

In the afternoon, three of the epistles to other Yearly Meetings were read. The reading of the remainder, and of the minutes, occupied the morning of Seventh-day. The meeting closed after a solemn silence; and we think we may add, that it has been a strengthening and consoling season to the great body of Friends.

A HEALTH TO THE POPE.

Here's a health unto Pius, the ninth of the name,
Here's a health unto Italy's hope;
Though we're sure to set Easter Hall in a flame
By proposing the health of the Pope.
But, wherever we find him, we honor a man
Of improvements who forwards the work;
Let him do all the good that he possibly can,
And we're ready to drink the Grand Turk.

For right feeling, with masculine wisdom combined,
An intense admiration we own,
Whomever they distinguish, indeed, never mind,
If they grace the pontifical throne.
He who puts down abuses and pushes reforms
In the danger of poison and knife,
Like a rare gallant fellow, our sympathy warms,
And we wish him success and long life!

One, and only one Briton has e'er had the luck
To be raised to the Fishermen's one;
But Pope Pius displays such decision and pluck,
One might think that a Briton was he.
Here's he holiness' very good health, then, once more,
The stars long rest on his pate!
And may Pius the Ninth, ere his popedom is o'er
Earn the title of Pius the Great.—Punch.

HERVIO NANO, THE MAN MONKEY.

His real name was Harvey Leach, and he was a native of Connecticut. He died in London, on the 16th ultimo, bequeathing his singular body to a celebrated surgeon, for dissection, and we learn from an article in "The London Literary Gazette," the following striking facts, elicited by the operator:—

"The head is remarkably fine in form, and the expression intelligent and benign; the chest, shoulders and arms form a perfect model of strength and beauty; the arms are exceedingly muscular, and the hands very well and strongly formed; when standing, the arms could reach the ground easily, so as to be employed in progression or leaping; in the place of legs, there are two limbs, the left about eighteen inches from the hip to the point of the toes, the right about twenty-four from the same points. The feet are natural. The easiest mode of explaining the nature of these limbs is to say, that it seems as though the thigh bones and muscles had disappeared, and the knee joints been raised up to the hips; the bone on the one side is tolerably like a leg bone, on the other it is compressed into an immensely strong bong, of triangular form, with the base upwards, and knit to the hip with very strong ligaments. These limbs are furnished with the muscles which should have belonged to the thigh, and those of the leg are much increased in size; the muscles of the calf being comparatively small, on account, probably, of his mode of walking, contributes to give the limb the look of a lion's fore-arm. Nearly double power must have been obtained over the feet by this arrangement; and this would account for his extraordinary feats of leaping, such as following a horse at full speed on the hands and feet, and suddenly springing on its back like a monkey, or jumping ten feet in the air. His mode of fighting, too, was most original; he used to spring in the air, and at the same instant deal the most terrific blow upon his unwary antagonist's head, so that he was a very formidable combatant. It is said that in his palmy days, while driving his cab, a clumsy carter drove against him, and, as usual, accused Hervio of being in fault, at which our hero sprang from his seat on to the back of the man, and gave him a most terrible thrashing. His feats of strength, in his monkey characters, are well known. A very good cast of the entire figure has been made."

EARLY CURRENCY IN THE WEST.—I may our prize many to learn that the first issue of paper money, or promises to pay, in the United States, is of Indian origin. In 1760 Pontiac, the great Indian Chief, issued bills of credit, or promises to pay, in hieroglyphics of his own, drawn upon bark, with the figure of an otter—his arms—beneath. I extract this fact from a rare work, publish ed in England, in 1765, called "A Concise Account of North America, by Major Robert Rogers."—The Major visited Pontiac in the course of his travels through the country, and saw this currency. He adds, that the whole commission was duly redeemed.—Cist's Advertiser.

A PRETTY IDEA.—Dr. P——, who is attached to a Parisian theatre in quality of a physician, expressed his astonishment that man and woman were not created at the same time, instead of the latter springing from a rib of our first parent. A young actress standing by, remarkable for the graceful turn which she ever gives to the expression of her ideas, immediately said, "Was it not natural, sir, that the flower should come after the stem?"

THE SHAKERS.

In the course of debate in the Legislature of New York, on an application for special grants of power in holding property made by the Shakers of Mahonas, in that State, the following rules or orders existing in that Society became public:

Contrary to order for any one to write the orders.

Contrary to order to inquire into the order of other families.

Contrary to order to inquire into any bargain that the Deacons have made.

Contrary to order to open your mind out of the line of order.*

Contrary to order to expose counsel, or tell what the Elders say.

Contrary to order to go to church with sins unconfessed.

Contrary to order to receive or write a letter, without the Elders perusal of it.

Contrary to order to take a book without liberty.

Contrary to order to go out among the world, or among families, without permission of the Elders.

Contrary to order to have any money privately.

Contrary to order to shake hands with a world's woman without confessing it.

Contrary to order to shake hands with the world unless they first tender the hand.

Contrary to order to play with dogs or cats.

Contrary to order for a brother and sister to ride together in a wagon, without company.

Contrary to order for a brother and sister to pass each other on the stairs.

Contrary to order for a person to go out of the door yard, after evening meeting.

Contrary to order to have right and left shoes.

Contrary to order to pare the heels of shoes under.

Contrary to order to read newspapers in dwelling house, at any time, unless indulgence for that purpose is granted by the Elders.

Contrary to order to fold the left thumb over the right, in prayer, or when standing up in worship.

Contrary to order to kneel with the left knee first.

Contrary to order to put the left boot or shoe on first.

Contrary to order to kneel with handkerchief in hand.

Contrary to order to put the left foot on the stairs first, when ascending.

*To open your mind, is to express your grievances, or confess your sins. The line of order is the elders of the family.

THE EYES—USE OF GLASSES.

In the November number of the Journal, we gave some rules for preserving the eye-sight, which have been somewhat extensively circulated through other journals. From that time to the present, we have been intending to say something more about the eyes.

In youth we were much troubled with weak eyes, and it was with difficulty that we were able to pursue our studies. As was the general custom then, we used spectacles; but now, we were advised to use green glasses, and so strictly did we follow the advice, that not a day or an evening was passed without them for twelve years. Upon quitting college, for the purpose of recruiting, we took a letter of introduction from President Wayland to his father then residing at Saratoga. Having arrived there, the introduction was presented, and we were made the guest of the reverend and venerable man. He was a pure Englishman, a man of sterling sense and integrity, and one of the best gardeners with whom it has ever been our pleasure to be acquainted.

While drinking the far-famed healing waters of the place, it was our custom to spend a portion of each day in "dressing the garden," with our much esteemed father. Here our conversation turned sometimes upon one thing, sometimes another, but generally, upon some point of utility.

One day, the good old man, after looking round, and casting a glance at our green eyes, exclaimed, "It seems to me that all our young men are growing blind. When I was young, we rarely saw a young man who could not see better without glasses than with, but now, almost every student wears them. What is the advantage?"

We were a little stumbled, but to throw off all blame from self, replied we had been advised to wear them on account of our eyes.

"I advise you to leave them off, on that account," was the prompt reply. We took the advice partially, and used them less, but did not lay them aside entirely. Sometime afterwards having the good fortune to be married, at the suggestion of our good lady, in conjunction with the advice above named, we laid them wholly aside. There they have laid in all their greenness, housed in their case, in our study-table drawer for a longer period than old Troy was besieged, and our eyes have been improving gradually from year to year. This is our advice to all who wear green glasses. Lay them aside, you will be better off without them.

We would give the same advice to all who wear other glasses, or, rather, we would advise all who have never put them on, never to do it. It is a needless thing. As age approaches it is customary to put on glasses, and people imagine that they must have them, and are assisted by them. But it is a mistake. We firmly believe that in most cases, the eyes are injured by them. All tampering with the eyes is bad. Every time we put glass between the cornea and the object, we cause a new modification and new adjustment of the parts within. After such a change has once been established, it is no easy task to destroy it, and bring the vision back to a natural state, and hence, when people have once commenced wearing glasses, it is very difficult to dispense with them.

As age approaches, the strength or tension of all the tissues of the body relaxes. This is the case with the eye, as well as with other organs. But would people from forty to fifty years of age, (the period in which the use of glasses is usually commenced,) insist that they would not wear them, they would find little need of them after the latter period.

It is a natural law that all the organs of the body accommodate themselves to their circumstances, and the eye does this especially. If, when by the approach of age, the vision begins to be impaired, it were not hampered by artificial indulgences, in the greater part of cases, the tissues would rectify themselves.

In near-sighted children the evil is augmented an hundred fold by wearing glasses concaved for the purpose of mitigating the difficulty. The eyes should always be let alone, unless they can be operated upon by a judicious and skillful practitioner. If we cannot have skillful oculists, we had better have none, and people had much better let their eyes alone than to be forever dabbling with them.—Journal of Health.

EXTRAORDINARY CONDUCT OF A MANIAC.

A pauper, named "Silly Ben," the inmate of a union not far from Essex, was so refractory that the governor, in order to subdue him, ordered that he should be confined in the "dead-house," where lay the body of a man lately deceased. After a lapse of two hours the parties visited the maniac, when, to his horror, the poor fellow, as he imagined, dropped a corpse at his feet as he opened the door. Horror-stricken, he hastened to the governor, who, upon being informed of the horrid circumstance, went, accompanied by several others, to the "dead house," where they beheld Silly Ben stretched upon the ground. While deploring his fate, the corpse in the coffin suddenly rose, exclaiming, "Hard times, master," and then shrank back into its narrow shell. An immediate rush from the habitation of death to the governor's house was the result, when the governor and several others fainted. After a great lapse of time a crowd of officers and others repaired to the dead house with every caution, and the greatest dread. It is needless to say that it was by each endeavoring to push his neighbor forward that the awful place was reached, when the mystery was solved by its being ascertained that Silly Ben dressed the dead man in his own clothes, and having placed him against the door, put the winding sheet and shroud upon himself, and then took the dead man's place in the coffin. Notwithstanding the fact having been proved, the governor and the others who beheld, as they imagined, the resurrection of the dead, have not even yet recovered the fearful effects of the fright. It is to be hoped that this occurrence will in future prevent governors acting in so brutal a manner towards even maniacs. What can be conceived so brutally cruel as the locking up the living with the dead?

LITERARY MOSAIC.

FROM THE BOSTON TRI-MONTHLY.

"The curfew tolls the knell of parting day,
To every clime, from Lapland to Japan;
To its one spark of beauty's heavenly ray,
Then the poet calmly in our own country very much, during the past twelve months.

Now, my friends, such having been the case, I will here suggest a mode which will prevent the rot, and produce the usual crop. I speak from experience in this matter. Let every farmer plant his potatoes above ground, in the following way. When your ground is well covered with manure, every 2½ or 3 feet throw two light furrows together, within 8 or 3 inches, then lay your seed on the top 10 or 12 inches apart, and cover it lightly. Afterwards give them the ordinary ploughing or dressing. The seed running near the surface, the ground becomes more mellow, the potato grows much larger, and in a wet season the unnecessary water will run off and prevent the rot.

This experiment was tried by a gentleman, in a lot, one half of which was put in the ordinary way, by ploughing down, and the other half put in as above. In the Fall, when taken up, not one could be found diseased, and more than double the quantity in bulk, as they had grown much larger than those planted on the other part of the lot.—Lancaster Examiner.

ASHES ON CORN.

A correspondent asks the editor of the Genesee Farmer, what is the best method of applying ashes on corn? Should it be put in the hill when planting?—on top of it after planting?—or after it comes up? And what is the quantity to be applied either way, of unleached or leached?

To which he replies:—The above are questions of considerable importance. Last season we injured a crop of corn, or rather saw it injured, by the application of ashes and salt, in contact with young tender plants. These were thrown with the hand on each hill. Had the application been made as soon as the corn was covered at planting, spreading the ashes and salt over considerable surface, no injury would have been done, while the fertilizers would have here extremely beneficial.

We shall use this season, on a five acre field, a compound of three bushels of unleached ashes, one of salt, one of gypsum, and a like quantity of bone dust per acre. This we shall scatter over each hill as soon as planted.

IMPROVED LANDS.

We have received several variation of wheat from the farm of Mr. Edward Stabler, near Sandy Spring, in this County—the height of No. 1 being about 2½ feet; Nos. 2 and 3, not quite so high, but far superior to any we have ever seen, then early. Some few years since, the greater portion of the field did not, when in cultivation, produce one barrel of merchantable corn to the acre. It has since had 12 bushels of lime to the acre, and last Fall, a light dressing of both bone dust and guano—6 to 8 bushels of the former, and 80 to 100 pounds Peruvian guano to the acre. These are but fair samples of the whole field. Each sample appears to be the produce of a single grain. The growth is as thick on the ground as it is luxuriant. Let all who have poor, worn out lands, that bring scarcely enough to pay taxes, adopt the same method of making them yield heavy and luxuriant crops, and Montgomery will soon become the garden spot of Maryland. It can be done.—Rockville Journal.

RICH ARTIFICIAL MANURE.—Samuel Davidson, of Geneva, N. Y., obtained one hundred and twenty-two bushels of corn per acre on land to which three bushels of the following manure was applied:—One barrel of human urine, to which was added six pounds of dissolved sulphate of magnesia (epsom salts,) was mixed with enough gypsum to moisten the whole. On another acre which had three bushels of dry plaster, there were ninety bushels. What part of the difference in the crops of these two acres, the mixture produced, would be interesting to know.—Albany Cultivator.

PRIDE OF CHINA.—Melia Azedarach, of Linn—sometimes called Bead Tree, from the appearance of the berries it bears—it is also called the Pride of India—It is one of the most beautiful of ornamental trees, and should be extensively cultivated for that purpose. Our highly esteemed friend, Dr. S. B. Martin, of this city, has presented us with a small quantity of the seed, of the above tree, saved from one of the species in his yard, which he requests us to distribute to those desirous of raising it.—American Farmer, Baltimore.

GRAND.—Our friend, Major John Jones, of "Wheatland," Bohemia Manor, has bought $700 worth of grass, for a Spring dressing for some of his fields. We never heard of so large a purchase being made in one Spring by any farmer in the United States. The Major is a man who doesn't mince matters.—Cecil Whig.

Fun and Frolic.

LONG SPEECHES.

Bradbury, of the Cincinnati News, tells a capital story about a man who, some years ago, was indicted in the Grant Circuit Court, State of Kentucky, for the crime of petit larceny. Determined not to surrender at discretion, the prisoner appeared on the day of trial, "by himself and counsel," as the law of that State permits. The evidence was heard, upon which it clearly appeared that the defendant had been guilty of stealing "one bag of corn worth two dollars and twenty cents." Nothing daunted by the array of facts against his client, the lawyer rose, and poured out an argument two hours in length. When he concluded, the jury retired, and after a brief consultation, returned a verdict of "petit larceny." The attorney moved for a new trial, which was granted by the Court, and the case again brought before the jury. This time the lawyer spoke three hours and a half, the result of which was a verdict by the jury of "guilty of grand larceny." Again the attorney rose to move a new trial. He argued himself, and commenced in a style of grandiloquence worthy of an itinerant tragedian. He had spoken but a few words when the prisoner rushed forward, seized him violently by the arm and exclaimed "Hush, hush, for Heaven's sake, hush! Another speech will hang me as sure as I'm a living man!"

THE DAY OF AN INCUBUS.—In Sept. 1791, after Burke's breach with Fox, Pitt invited him for the first time to dine with him: Lord Grenville Burke, Addington and Pitt, constituted the party. After dinner, Burke was earnestly representing the danger which threatened the country, from the contagion of French principles, when Pitt said:—"Never fear, Mr. Burke; depend on it we shall go on as we are, until the day of judgment." "Very likely, sir," replied Mr. Burke, "it is the day of no judgment that I am afraid of."

HARD WORDS.—A physician thus addressed a surgeon, while in their patient's chamber

"You must not fail to phlebotomize the old gentleman to-morrow morning."

"I will never suffer it," cried the sick man, in a fright.

"Sir, don't be alarmed," replied the surgeon, "the doctor only orders you to be bled."

"Oh! as for bleeding," replied he, "it matters little; but as for the other, I would sooner die than endure it."

EPIGRAM.

"A dandy in a chap that would
Be a young lady if he could;
But as he can't, does all he can
To show the world he's not a man."

A SAD DISAPPOINTMENT.—"Vat's de matter, vat's de matter?" exclaimed an old Dutch friend of ours, as he tucked up his apron, and ran out of his shop to know the meaning of a crowd in his neighborhood. "Vat's de matter?"

"There's a man killed," replied a bystander.

"Oh, ish dat all!" said our friend evidently disappointed: "ish dat all! shoot a man killed! humph, I tho't it was a fight."

A GOOD ONE.—The two young princes, the sons of Archduke Charles, of Austria, had a very warm dispute in presence of no less a person than the Emperor himself. Greatly excited, one said to the other, "you are the greatest ass in all Vienna." Highly offended at such a quarrel, in his presence, the Emperor interrupted them, saying with indignation, "Come, come, young gentlemen, you forget that I am present!"

MARRIAGE OF THE SEASONS.—Upon a marriage at Hobertville, Me., of Mr. Edward Spring, to Miss Margaret Winter, by the Rev. Thomas Thaw, it was remarked "a these naturally turns Winter into Spring."

CONUNDRUM.—If the poker, tongs and shovel come to $6, what will the coals come to?—Ashes!

A DEEP OR GREAT WATER.—A celebrated writer of transcribing, being caught recently in a shower, took refuge under a portico. A very pretty young woman lifted the window, and after looking at him attentively for a moment, cast a servant out to him with an umbrella. The next day, the delighted author dressed himself up to his best result of the problem of what was becoming, and as the umbrella was an old one, laid it aside as a souvenir, and purchased a new one of the excellent taste, called on the lady to return her fluttering loan. She received the new umbrella evidently without remarking the change, and, after listening with curious gravity, to the rather pressing endearments of the dramatist's acknowledgments, the suddenly comprehended that he was under the impression that she was summoned of him; and forthwith, naively explained, that, as he had stood in the way of a gentleman who wished to come and see her unobserved, she had sent him the umbrella to get him off her front steps!—Home Journal.

PRODUCTIVE INDUSTRY.—Two college graduates, neither of them remarkable for doing much, parted on taking their degrees, and met again for the first time after nearly twenty years, one of them as poor as a church mouse, and the other a semi-millionaire, with a house in ——— street, when the following dialogue took place:

A. (the rich one)—Well, B., how do you flourish?

B.—Poor as death.

A.—Ah! That's a pity. I am afraid you have not been industrious. Industry always acquires wealth in this country.

B.—Indeed! By what industry did you acquire yours?

A.—Why, I—I—I—married a rich wife.

EXAMINING A WITNESS.—A witness examined in one of the courts of Illinois, upon trial concerning a horse trade, was asked by the counsel for the defendant, how the plaintiff generally rode?

Witness—He generally rides astraddle, sir.

Counsel—How does he ride in company?

Witness—If he has a good horse he always keeps up.

Counsel—How does he ride when he is alone?

Witness—Really, sir, I cannot say, for I never was in company with him when he rode by himself.

Counsel—You may stand aside, sir.

COUTER'S HELP IT.—A fellow applied to one of our Senators, says the St. Louis Reveille, at the present session of the Legislature, to get him some office; and to support his claim, told the Senator he had fought with Jackson at New Orleans. The member doubted his story, and to test the truth, remarked—

"I went vote for you, because you let the British take the city!"

"We couldn't help it," replied the candidate—"we fought like tigers, but they were too much for us!"
